Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take up the time of the House on this bill. I have prepared a statement in regard to the Articles of War, which I will ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that his remarks on the Articles of War be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, the Articles of War constitute a code of criminal law which applies to all persons subject thereto, including many civilians as well as officers and enlisted men of the Army. The Articles of War nullify all of their civil rights in conflict therewith, including their right to trial by jury. This criminal code authorizes the infliction of penalties of all grades, including death, imprisonment, fines and forfeitures, deprivation of citizenship, dismissal from public office, and dishonorable discharge from the military service. Any of these penalties may be imposed by a court-martial composed of as few as seven officers, in the selection of whom the accused has no voice whatever, and from whose action there is no appeal, except to the military or other executive authorities who have ordered the trial of the accused, and have selected the members of the court to try him. No court in the land has power to modify or set aside the findings or sentence of any court-martial acting within the powers conferred upon it by this criminal code.

In view of the great importance and gravity of the issues involved in the legislation proposed by Senate amendment 139 the conferees of the House felt that it ought not to be embodied in an appropriation bill, and that only as a separate measure could the House of Representatives give it the consideration, and subject it to the scrutiny which its importance demands. Moreover the very same measure as a separate bill (S. 3191) was actually pending before and under investigation by the Military Committee of the House.

Such study of Senate amendment 139 as we could give revealed so many objectionable features that, however solicitous we might be to reach a complete agreement on the whole bill, we felt that without the elimination of at least the most of these features we could not properly take back such an agreement to this House and then compel it to accept the amendment with all of its faults or else to reject the whole report. We therefore insisted strenuously upon the elimination from the Senate amendment of those features which seemed to us to be the most dangerous.

Under the old Articles of War the power of the prosecution—i. e., the military authorities, the Secretary of War, and the President—was almost unlimited, and their action was not subject to effective review or control by any court or any other agency in the land. On the other hand, suspicion or disfavor on the part of military or other executive authorities was wellnigh defenseless against the overwhelming power and influence of these authorities. The accused had no voice in the selection of the members of the court-martial—the judges and the jury—which was to try him. And against the premeditated packing of such a court with members hostile to him or likely to be subservient to the views or desires of those conducting or instigating his prosecution his sole protection was his right of challenging any member of the court, but only for cause. This protection was slight at the best, but in the case of a hostile court, packed or otherwise, it was utterly worthless, because in any case a challenge by the accused must be decided by the court itself, and from that decision there was no appeal. Of course, the decision of a hostile court would be adverse to the accused and would leave the membership of the court unchanged.

Examination of Senate amendment 139 showed us that many of the changes proposed by it in the old Articles of War would not only increase greatly the power of the prosecution over those accused by it but would extend that power to, and would make subject to the new Articles of War, thousands of persons never before subject to the criminal law of the Army, including many civilians.

Specifically, some of the most objectionable and dangerous features of Senate amendment 139 of the Senate bill 3191, now before the Military Committee of the House, are as follows:

The proposed amendment to section 1342, Revised Statutes, as well as sections a and g of proposed article 2 would make subject to the Articles of War at all times and all places all persons now or hereafter belonging to or constituting a part of the armies of the United States. But the national defense act, approved June 3, 1916, provided for the creation of two great organizations of civilians for possible military service in time of war, to wit, the Officers' Reserve Corps and the Enlisted Reserve Corps, the members of which would be subject to the Articles of War only when ordered into active service or for purposes of instruction or training. Section 1 of said national defense act declares these two corps to be a part of the Regular Army. The new Articles of War, therefore, would make all members of these organizations, while engaged in their civilian pursuits, without having received a dollar from the Government and without having been called out for any purpose or having any actual connection whatever with the Army, at all times and all places subject to be haled before a court-martial at the whim of the local Regular Army officer empowered to convene such courts in that locality for the trial of officers or enlisted men of the Army. These unfortunate civilians would thus be deprived of some of the most valuable of their civil rights, including the right of trial by jury, for alleged offenses that some Army officer might see fit to try them for under the criminal code of the Army. It is needless to say that the enactment of any such legislation as this would be a serious if not fatal obstacle to the creation of the Officers' Reserve Corps and the Enlisted Reserve Corps created by the act of June 3, 1916. In the face of such legislation and the risk incident thereto but few prudent civilians could be expected to offer themselves for membership in either of said corps.

Section 7 of proposed Article Z would make subject to the Army criminal code and to trial by courts-martial all persons under treatment in the general hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., or the tuberculosis hospital at Fort Bayard, N. Mex.; and these hospitals are open to the admission, under authorization by the Secretary of War, of many civilians. Section 8 of the same article would make subject to this code all persons accompanying the armies of the United States without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. This would include even the wives and children living with officers and enlisted men who might be stationed in any place occupied by the Army, possibly for a long period of time outside of such territorial jurisdiction.

These and other attempts to extend the operation of the criminal code of the Army seemed to us so alarming and dangerous that we decided to offer as a substitute for the provisions in question amendments that would restrict the operation of the Articles of War to persons having some active relation to the military service, and to exempt all persons who have no such relation but who at all times and in all places are fully subject to the operation of the civil laws. These amendments were accepted by the Senate conferees, and were embodied in the amended bill as finally reported to and passed by both Houses.

These amendments exempted from the operation of the Articles of War retired officers and retired enlisted men, not on active duty and having precisely the same status as retired judges and other pensioners, all of whom are always fully subject to the operation of the civil laws. But this exemption we regard as a relatively unimportant matter and wholly secondary to the vitally important exemptions that we insisted should be made with regard to civilians, as above described. The exemption of retired officers and enlisted men was not made at the instance or suggestion of any person outside of the conference committee. So far as the conferees of the House know, no retired officer or enlisted man approached any member of the committee with regard to the matter, either directly or indirectly. And so far as we know no retired officer or enlisted man has manifested the slightest desire to have such an exemption made. This being the case this particular and unimportant exemption may well be abandoned. But the other and far more important amendments relating to members of the two civilian reserve corps and other civilians should be most decidedly insisted upon.

Article 18 of the new code proposed to give the prosecution the statutory right of challenging members of a court-martial, a right that from time immemorial has been denied to the prosecution and given only to the accused who can have no voice whatever in selecting the membership of the court-martial which is to try him. The prosecution under the old Articles of War has full power to shape the membership of any court-martial as it pleases, utterly regardless of the interests of the accused, and it is now proposed to give it a further opportunity to shape it over again if it should be found that the original shaping is not entirely satisfactory to the prosecution or those inspiring it. Inasmuch as the court itself has the final decision as to all challenges, the proposed innovation would materially lessen the little protection that the accused now has against a court hostile to him through design or otherwise.

Article 44: From very early days the Articles of War have prohibited the infliction of the death penalty except by concurrence of two-thirds of the entire membership of a court-martial. It is now proposed to permit the infliction of this extreme penalty upon concurrence of only two-thirds of the members present. This opens the door to the manipulation of the membership of a court which may be fatally injurious to the accused. We regard it as a dangerous innovation and one that is indicative of the purpose, manifest throughout the new articles, to enhance the power of the prosecution and to diminish or destroy the few safeguards that the law now affords military subordinates against unfairness, oppression, and injustice on the part of their superiors.

Sections 56 and 57: From the earliest days the Articles of War and Army regulations have required the periodical rendition of muster rolls and returns in such a form as to give a complete military history of officers, enlisted men, and organizations comprising the Army. These records are a mine of historical information, to be found nowhere else, and which is simply invaluable in the adjustment of pension and other claims against the Government, to say nothing of its value for current uses and as a source of historical data in the distant future. Sections 56 and 57 of the new code propose to omit the time-honored requirement that these records shall be made and preserved, thus leaving to the discretion of a constantly changing personnel in the offices of The Adjutant General, the Chief of Staff, and the Secretary of War to determine whether or not these reports and returns shall be rendered. We regard this proposed innovation as most injurious to the interests of the Government in view of the many and great interests involved, especially in view of the vast pecuniary interests of the Government and of claimants against the Government on account of the rendition or alleged rendition of military service.

There are numerous other more or less important objections which may be urged against Senate amendment 139, but I think enough has been said to show that the conferees on the part of the House would have been derelict in their duty to this House if they had brought back a complete agreement which would have accepted any of the most objectionable features which were excluded from the complete agreement which they did bring back.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Just for the RECORD. My understanding is that the bill which is now pending is exactly the same as the conference report which was agreed to, both by the House and the Senate, and which went to the President, except that it leaves out the Articles of War and corrects a few typographical errors.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asked me for three or four minutes of time, but I assume that he does not care about it particularly, and there is nobody else on this side who desires time

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill as read.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the remarks which I have prepared upon the act approved June 3, 1916, which is known as the national-defense act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD as part of his remarks certain remarks which he has written out on the national-defense act. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, of course I do not intend to object, but I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia will give heed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A number of questions have arisen—some coming from the frontier—with regard to the effect of certain paragraphs and clauses of the national-defense act, and I want to inquire if the gentleman's remarks are an amplification of the bill?

Mr. HAY. No; my remarks simply state what the bill does in the way of preparedness.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand. Certain interpretations by the War Department of the act have been published from time to time. The gentleman's remarks are not in that connection?

Mr. HAY. No; they are not in that connection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, the act approved June 3, 1916, and now known as the national-defense act, contains in its provisions as much preparedness as is possible under our volunteer system. If a larger Army is thought necessary, it must be obtained through compulsory military service. Recent events have demonstrated that in time of peace it will be impossible to recruit the Army to the strength authorized by that act. And having in mind the experience of this country during the Civil War, it seems a certainty that we would be obliged to resort to the draft to raise an Army large enough to make war with a first-class power or to repel the invasion of such a power.

The national-defense act provides an Army in time of peace of 65 regiments of Infantry, 25 regiments of Cavalry, 21 regiments of Field Artillery, 30,000 men in the Coast Artillery, with the necessary complement of officers, seven regiments of Engineers, and all the other necessary corps and departments for the proper administration of our Military Establishment. The act provides for 175,000 enlisted men of the line in time of peace, besides the enlisted men of the Quartermaster Corps, the Hospital Corps, the Signal Corps, and other corps of the Army, making in all in time of peace an Army of about 216,000, which, expanded at full strength in time of war, will be about 256,000 men.

The act further provides for the officers to officer this Army and makes provision for the proper organization of the Army in such a way as will best conduce to its discipline and effectiveness.

The act makes provision for a large and effective aviation service, increases the Medical Department, and makes certain that all necessary sanitary measures will be taken to preserve the health of our soldiers in the field.

It provides for 1,022 officers whose duty it will be to train the National Guard and to instruct in military tactics the young men of the country who are attending our colleges and schools.

It provides for a Regular Army reserve which, in course of a reasonably short time, will be composed of men who have served for at least three years in the Army and who can be called to the colors whenever the emergency demands it. The act provides for an officers' reserve corps in which can be placed men from all the occupations of life who are specially fitted for service in any branch of the Army and can be called for service in time of war. Means are provided for the instruction of these officers.

There is further provided the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. This corps is authorized to be established and maintained in the civil educational institutions of the country. It will be composed of the flower of the youth of the country attending the universities, colleges, and institutions of the land, particularly of those attending institutions known as land-grant colleges. Officers of the Army will be detailed to these institutions. Enlisted men may also be detailed to them. Arms, ammunition, equipment, animals, and the necessary means of transportation are to be issued to them. Camps are to be maintained for six weeks during the year for the practical instruction of these students. When these students graduate in the military courses prescribed for these schools, they can be appointed to the Officers' Reserve Corps, and under certain circumstances may be furnished with subsistence during two years of their college course. A graduate is also eligible for temporary appointment as a second lieutenant in the Army.

The act also provides for training camps to be maintained for military training and instruction of the citizens of the country, and to provide them with everything necessary for that training, including transportation to and from the training camps.

It also provides for an enlisted reserve corps, the members of which are to be enrolled in time of peace and trained for 15 days each year, so that in time of war they will be ready for military service in the different branches of the service for which they are best adapted.

The act provides for a National Guard to consist of about 467,000 men, with the necessary complement of officers. This force is to be kept on foot at all times, and is to be regularly trained and disciplined under Federal supervision, and can be used by the President for training purposes in time of peace, or to repel invasion, to suppress insurrection, and to execute the laws of the Union. In time of war, the authority of Congress being given the President to raise more troops than there are in the Regular Army, he is authorized to draft the members of the National Guard into the service of the United States.

The act provides for the encouragement of rifle practice among the able-bodied male citizens of the country.

It provides for the purchase and procurement of military supplies in time of actual or threatened war, and provides for the coordination of the industries of the country for that purpose.

It provides for the procurement and use of gauges, dies, jigs, and so forth, for the manufacture of arms and ammunition.

The act provides for a nitrate plant, so that this country in time of war, and at all times, may be independent of foreign countries for its supply of nitrates for the manufacture of powder.

The Army appropriation bill provides for a council of national defense.

Thus this Congress has provided a complete scheme for the national defense of the country. It rests with the executive branch of the Government to bring this scheme to a successful issue.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Virginia about a matter?

Mr. HAY. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. In the Army appropriation bill which we have just passed there is an item, I believe, of $2,000,000 for training camps.

Mr. HAY. Yes; $2,000,000.

Mr. MANN. They are starting to hold a training camp at Camp Douglas, in Utah, now, and the Senate passed a bill yesterday, making an appropriation of $30,000, so that the money would be immediately available for expenditure this week. In fact, the troops are now traveling on the train. I think the bill has not come over yet. The gentleman is willing to try to pass that, I believe?

Mr. HAY. I would be very glad to pass that. I understand that the $30,000 is to be taken from the $2,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Yes. As a matter of fact, that was the expectation on my part, but as the bill was drawn—and it was drawn in the Judge Advocate's office—it does not specifically provide that, although Senator SMOOT told me that Gen. Scott told him that it would, in fact, be taken from the $2,000,000.

Mr. HAY. It would not make any difference anyway. I think $2,000,000 is ample to take care of that camp and any more that may be desired. If I am not here when the bill comes over, I hope nobody will object when it is called up.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the emergency in the case of this Utah camp as compared with the Plattsburg camp?

Mr. HAY. As I understand it, the Utah camp had been scheduled to open on the 21st of August—that is, yesterday—with the expectation that the Army bill would then be a law, as it had passed both Houses, and the young men who are attending that camp or who propose to attend it had made all their preparations to go, and the War Department had provided for their transportation and subsistence, and if there is any delay about it, the arrangements for the camp will be broken up and the camp will not be held.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House whether the War Department, in anticipation of the enactment of the Army appropriation providing for transportation expenses for the persons attending these camps, has also made provision for the transportation of those attending Plattsburg and other camps?

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. KAHN. There is a provision in the bill to the effect that the money so expended shall be taken out of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the phraseology as it passed the House there was no authority granted to provide for transportation incurred prior to the enactment of the bill.

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes. It provided that that money should be expended for the camps hereafter had and those that had already been had.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have had some correspondence with the division agent, who said that no promise had been made to provide for the transportation prior to the enactment of the bill.

Mr. MANN. How could he promise?

Mr. STAFFORD. The phraseology allows the transportation?

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman has any doubt about it, I will be glad to read to him the language of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman is certain about it, I will accept his statement. I do not care about delaying the proceedings.

Mr. HAY. The bill reads:

To provide for the expense of maintaining, upon military reservations or elsewhere, camps for the military instruction and training of such citizens as may be selected for such instructions and training, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and to furnish to said citizens the subsistence, transportation, and uniforms authorized by the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, $2,000,000.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will find it in the proviso.

Mr. HAY. The proviso is:

Provided, That so much of this appropriation as may be necessary shall be available for the subsistence and transportation of all persons between the ages of 18 and 45 years who have attended any camp authorized by the Secretary of War during the calendar year 1916.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is entirely satisfactory.

SHIPPING.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Speaker to lay before the House the shipping bill (H. R. 15455), with Senate amendments; and when that is done, I shall move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 15455) to establish a United States shipping board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, if that motion is to be pressed, I shall raise the question of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] say to that?

Mr. MANN. I suppose no motion is in order.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do not know of any motion that is in order, and therefore I shall raise the question of a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I sincerely hope the gentleman will not delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I shall do so in every possible way that I can.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Of course it will result in inconvenience to gentlemen on that side as well as on this side.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I can not help the inconvenience. That is not my business at all. I shall object in every way to the consideration of this bill, and reserve the rights that I have as a Member of this House, and as a minority member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Of course it will necessitate the bringing back here of the membership of the House.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is not my fault.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This bill will become a law before this Congress adjourns.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Very well; if it does, it will become a law over my head. I shall object to it in every way I possibly can, from now until Congress adjourns.

Mr. MANN. Let it lie on the Speaker's table temporarily.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No; I object.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask that the bill lie on the Speaker's table temporarily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Illinois both ask that this bill lie temporarily on the Speaker's table.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. MANN. What is the harm in letting it lie on the Speaker's table?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am not going to have it called up at some time when I may not be here.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri withdraw his request that the bill be laid before the House?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this bill will lie temporarily on the Speaker's table.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I object.

The SPEAKER. There is no amendment to this bill that requires it to go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do not care whether it goes to the Committee of the Whole or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold it on the Speaker's table.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. All right, hold it then.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is where it belongs.

The SPEAKER. That is where it belongs under the rule.

PUBLIC LANDS FOR CEMETERY AND PARK PURPOSES—VETO MESSAGE (H. DOC. NO. 1335).

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without my approval House bill 11162. My reasons for not signing the bill are these:

The act of September 30, 1890, which this bill is intended to amend, authorized incorporated cities and towns to acquire unreserved public lands for certain community uses. The bill which I return is intended to extend that authorization to portions of the national forests. I respectfully call your attention to the fact that such an extension of privilege is not in fact needed for the objects sought to be promoted by this bill, and that by its becoming law many very important safeguards to the preservation and development of the national forests would be removed which it is greatly to the public interest should be preserved.

National-forest lands can not be regarded as suitable for disposition for general purposes in the same way that unreserved public lands are. They are already devoted to public uses and should not be unnecessarily alienated. Their alienation is unnecessary because the objects of this bill can be attained, and are in large measure being attained, under existing law.

Whenever municipalities wish to secure national-forest lands for cemetery purposes it is the practice, under the act of September 30, 1890, to provide for such acquisition by eliminating the necessary tracts from the national forest domain by presidential proclamation. No representation has been received from any municipality that under this proceeding the necessary lands for cemeteries could not be obtained. Demands for national-forest lands for sewerage purposes could be similarly dealt with under the law of 1890, and the same liberal policy now obtaining would undoubtedly be pursued with regard to them.

The act of February 1, 1905 (33 Stat., 628) already provides ample means for the use of national-forest lands for municipal water supply. The Department of Agriculture is now actually providing for the protection of the water supply of a large number of western municipalities under special cooperative agreements which fully safeguard the interests of the communities concerned. The department, indeed, recognizes the protection of the watersheds from which municipalities derive their supply of water against any form of contamination or conflicting use as one of the most important functions in its administration of the national forests. It has sought to bring about the extension of this form of use and protection and has repeatedly taken the initiative in calling the attention of various municipalities to the need of utilizing national-forest watershed areas and to the possibility of doing so without purchasing the lands. The department, moreover, is already providing for special local needs for recreation purposes by making the national forests freely available for such uses and by taking steps to develop their availability as public recreation grounds.

The bill which I return would give cities and towns the right to select and acquire a total of 1,440 acres of land for the several purposes mentioned at a uniform price of $1.25 an acre, without regard to the value of the timber on it or to the need of the land for other public purposes, or to the effect of the alienation of ownership on the administration of the forests, and especially upon the administration of adjacent or neighboring areas. Counties may select 640 acres. Since the same rights would accrue to new cities, towns, and counties, this general grant might in the long run result in the alienation of a very large proportion of the national-forest areas. It would probably result at times in the selection by cities, towns, and counties of lands which would in fact have a much larger public value if put to other uses. In some cases the loss of the lands selected would seriously hamper their development. No opportunity is afforded by the bill for weighing the general public interests against the local interests directly involved.

But the most serious objection to the bill is that it subjects the national forests to disposition under a general grant. At the very time while provision is being made for purchase by the Government of forested lands in the East for the protection of watersheds, it is proposed to permit similar lands in the West to be permanently alienated. I would respectfully urge that it is unwise to permit alienation of the national forests under general legislation of this sort. If the process of piecemeal distribution is begun, independently of any oversight or control of the National Government, there is manifest danger that the forests will be so disintegrated as to make their efficient administration impossible and the purposes for which they were established unattainable. Against such a process the national forests should be carefully protected.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 22, 1916.

Mr. RAKER. I move that the President's message and the bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPUNGING OF PERSONALITIES.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report (No. 1170) from the special committee having under consideration H. Res. 315, and I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The rules of the House provide that in addressing the House Members must avoid personalities (par. 1, rule 14), and this rule is amplified by the following statement in Jefferson's Manual:

"The consequences of a measure may be reprobated in strong terms; but to arraign the motives of those who propose to advocate it is a personality, and against order." (House Manual and Digest, secs. 354, 355, 356, and note, pp. 136 and 137, and Hinds' Precedents, vol. 5, secs. 5147–5155.)

This rule has been enforced even by Speakers interrupting a Member on the floor and challenging a Member for the use of personalities. In the case in question there was no opportunity either for the Member to himself object or for the Presiding Officer or another Member to call attention to the violation of the rule, because of the fact that the record shows that the words complained of were not uttered on the floor, but were inserted in the revision and extension of the speech for printing in the RECORD.

Your special committee to whom was referred House resolution numbered 315 beg leave to report:

That the language which appears in a speech made by Hon OSCAR CALLAWAY, of Texas, and which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 1, 1916, as follows:

"The Maxims, GARDNERS, and THOMPSONS have attempted to frighten the people into the belief that we were in danger of invasion. This is not the fear that disturbs the peace of mind of the gentlemen on the Naval Affairs Committee who heard the evidence. The fear that disturbs the peace of mind of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts is not that our homes will be invaded, our cities bombarded, or our coasts laid waste; it is that the stocks of the Bethlehem, Midvale, Carnegie, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and New Jersey steel, ordnance, and ship manufacturing concerns will shrink when the foreign war closes unless a new market is developed. Bethlehem Steel stock increased, due to the war, from $30 a share to $530 a share. Certain powder stocks increased from $8 a share to $1,100 a share"— was a personality, arraigned the motives of a Member, and was for that reason in violation of the rules of the House, and we recommend that said language be expunged from the RECORD.

ROBERT N. PAGE.
JOHN E. RAKER.
E. T. TAYLOR.
F. W. MONDELL.
H. M. TOWNER.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the recommendations of the committee be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House House joint resolution 247, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the act approved June 16, 1898 (30 Stat. L., 473), shall be applicable in all cases of military service rendered in connection with operations in Mexico, or along the borders thereof, or in mobilization camps elsewhere, whether such service be in the military or naval organization of the United States or the National Guard of the several States now or hereafter in the service of the United States.

With the following Senate amendment:

Line 4, after "1898," insert "chapter 458."

Mr. MANN. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 6369) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 6369, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 15774, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina calls up the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

Amendment numbered 25: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$20,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$1,200"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For the purchase or condemnation of a site to contain not less than 5,400 square feet (at a cost not exceeding $20,000), and for the erection of a central garage thereon, $35,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JAS. MCANDREWS,
C. R. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. RAKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. Is it in order to move to recede from a Senate amendment—for instance, Senate amendment 58—which is in disagreement?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. We have not reached the disagreement stage yet. This is with reference to matters that the conferees have already agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first thing is to get rid of the conference report as far as it goes and then take up these other matters. The gentleman can not change the conference report.

Mr. RAKER. I am aware of that; but after the conference report is adopted, then will a motion to concur in a Senate amendment be in order?

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon amendments 1, 58, 108, 354, 355, 356, 359, and 361, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to amendments 1, 58, 108, 354, 355, 356, 359, and 361.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will it now be in order to move that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment 58 and concur in the same?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say this, if the gentleman from North Carolina will yield.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. This is a controverted question, and it may require the presence of a quorum here. I think possibly the same result may be obtained if I am granted permission to insert in the RECORD a statement relating to this case, and I ask to print in the RECORD a statement showing the facts of the case in behalf of Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a statement in regard to amendment 58.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, this is a case where $4,000 has been allowed to a man who lives in the District of Columbia, an employee of the Senate, for some damage said to have been done to some property owned by him, after the courts have adjudicated the case and said that there was no damage done.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman is saying is historical. The matter that the gentleman from California wants to insert in the RECORD was inserted two years ago by myself at the instance of somebody else. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object, because the more people know about the case the more votes we will have against it.

Mr. MADDEN. The only question I am interested in is whether or not the House will agree to the payment of $4,000 recommended in the bill by the Senate when it refused to pay $2,000 for the same purpose last year.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that he need not lose any sleep or have any fears that it will be paid.

Mr. RAKER. Of course a general statement can be made in regard to these matters, but anyone who looks into the record of this case and sees where they paid $6,000 damages for lot 13, and then assessed $480 benefits against lots 11 and 12, owned by these people, which they had to pay into the treasury of the District of Columbia, can see the injustice of it. It does not require any great stretch of the imagination for anyone to see the absolute injustice and that these people ought to be paid in proportion to what was allowed the other lots.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman printing the statement in the RECORD?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I would like to ask the gentleman from California if this is a claim against the Government?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; it is in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Why not submit it to the Committee on Claims?

Mr. RAKER. Because this is a good way to pay it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. But there are gentlemen on the conference committee that disagree to that. Let me say to the gentleman that the conferees have examined this property inch by inch and foot by foot, and listened to all the arguments pro and con, and it is purely a claim, and let them submit it to the Committee on Claims and see how far they can get.

Mr. RAKER. But that does not controvert the actual facts where this piece of property adjoining was given $6,000 damages, and right side by side of it on the same street and under the same conditions these people were assessed as a benefit $480 over and above any damages which they paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia, with the same character of land.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. CARLIN. I thought the gentleman from California had the floor.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to state at this point that I yielded the time to the gentleman, and I hope that nobody will object to this request for unanimous consent that these papers may be put in. However, if the gentleman is going to make an argument, not for the benefit of those who are present here but for the benefit of those in another body on this much-controverted matter, I shall feel sorry that I yielded him the time, and doing that I think some one else will be entitled to enter an argument upon the other side. I do not care to enter into that, however, at this time, and I hope that there will be no further discussion of the matter now.

Mr. RAKER. I did not want to make an argument.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman did not make an argument; he made a statement.

Mr. RAKER. I tried to avoid discussion of this matter by inserting this in the RECORD, but when a matter is brought up I can not yield my convictions as to that, and therefore I was compelled most unwillingly to make this statement of facts as they appear to me.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I have always found that it was dangerous to inject an interrogation into any remarks that the gentleman from California is making, if one expects him not to enter into an argument.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the several amendments reported by the Clerk and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, of course I yield, because I do not want to bring a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has just been granted permission to print his statement.

Mr. RAKER. That has been granted; but I do not call for a vote because it might bring a quorum, and I did not want to impose that hardship upon the Members.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Mr. MCANDREWS, and Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution (No. 55) concerning the enrollment of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in enrolling the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 15774) the Clerk is directed, on page 43, line 18, of the original bill, to enroll the salary of the janitor of the old Central High School Building and annex in the sum of $1,000 and correct the total of the amended paragraphs and the total, on page 46, in line 14, of the bill, by inserting the sums of $2,680 and $174,470, respectively.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution which the Clerk has reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

LAWS IN RESTRAINT OF MONOPOLY.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that Senate joint resolution 129, extending until April 15, 1917, the effective date of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, be laid before the House, a similar resolution having been reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House Senate joint resolution 129, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the effective date on and after which the provisions of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, shall become and be effective is hereby deferred and extended to April 15, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CARLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

NATIONAL PARK SERVICE.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 15522) to establish a national park service, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up a conference report and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1136).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 15522 having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2 with an amendment as follows: "except that this provision shall not apply to the Yellowstone National Park."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
WM. L. LA FOLLETTE,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. L. MYERS,
C. S. THOMAS,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15522) to establish a national park service, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the actions agreed on:

Senate amendment No. 1: This amendment strikes out the provision by which other employees may from time to time be provided for by Congress, and in lieu thereof gives the Secretary that authority.

The amendment is designed to give the Secretary of the Interior a certain degree of latitude in designating the personnel of this service. It will be observed that the proviso of section 1 of this act stipulates that "not more than $8,100 annually shall be expended for salaries of experts, assistants, and employees within the District of Columbia not herein specifically enumerated unless previously authorized by law."

The Secretary of the Interior advised the Public Lands Committee of the Senate that he desired to employ clerical and other assistants in the national park service at salaries comparatively low, thus providing opportunities for advancement as the individual employee demonstrated by his interest in his assignments and by his ability to perform his duties satisfactorily that he was worthy of promotion. He believed that this arrangement would result in greater efficiency than would a system of designated clerkships with fixed salaries attached thereto by Congress itself.

Hon. Stephen T. Mather, Assistant to the Secretary of the Interior, stated to the subcommittee of the House Public Lands Committee, which had this bill under consideration, that he hoped none of the salaries of the service would be designated. It was his desire that even the assistant director and the chief clerk be selected from among the most competent men that the service succeeded in securing after its organization. The Public Lands Committee, after full consideration of his arguments, deemed it wise to designate the more important position. The subcommittee, however, recognize the advisability of giving the Secretary of the Interior a certain degree of latitude in selecting other necessary clerical and expert assistants, and therefore recommend the adoption of the wording of amendment No. 1 now under consideration.

Amendment No. 2 relates to the grazing of live stock in the national parks. The provision which the committee of conference recommends authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to grant the privilege of grazing live stock in any national park, monument, or reservation, except Yellowstone National Park. It has long been recognized that live-stock grazing in the mountains protects forests from fire. Again, it is well established that there are certain remote sections of the various parks which at the present time are not visited by tourists, and that there are grazing lands in these remote sections which are not used for any purpose now. It is believed that in these sections of the parks live stock should be permitted to graze upon the payment of reasonable fees. Certain revenues would thus accrue to the park administration, as well as providing an additional protection against forest fires. Whenever the needs of tourists make the granting of grazing permits inadvisable the Secretary of the Interior would, of course, deny admission of live stock to the park.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
WM. L. LA FOLLETTE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill was given consideration under unanimous consent in the House and passed on a tacit understanding that the phraseology as embodied in the bill would be adhered to by the conferees so far as they could see their way to do so. The bill as brought back from the conference contains a very material amendment which takes away from the Congress the right to limit the amount of appropriations that may be expended for clerical service in this new national park service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. When the bill was before the House I offered an amendment to it, and it went into the bill, and that is the language that the Senate struck out. It was not in the bill as reported to the House for consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. This language?

Mr. MANN. That went in on an amendment which I offered in the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Referring to amendment No. 1 or amendment No. 2?

Mr. MANN. I mean the one with reference to Congress appropriating for the clerical help.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is my recollection that as reported it contained this language: "Such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide for by appropriation or other act."

Mr. MANN. I said to the gentleman, and I repeat it——

Mr. STAFFORD. I heard what the gentleman said. I am giving him my recollection.

Mr. MANN. I said that the language of the bill as reported to the House was "such other employees as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary." When the bill was under consideration I offered an amendment changing it to make it read as it passed the House. The gentleman was assuming that these amendments were tacitly agreed to. It was after unanimous consent had been given that the amendment was offered, and nothing had been said about it before. Upon investigation I found that the department wished to put into this bureau some men it already had in the employ of the Interior Department, working in reference to the parks, but which would not be covered by the language in the bill. In fact, that statement was made to me before I offered the amendment. But I insisted upon offering the amendment, with the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] that if upon investigation it was discovered they were right about this it could be corrected in the Senate, as was done.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has explained the situation as it occurred.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not even agree that it is a wise amendment, notwithstanding the explanation. I think that Congress ought, as in all cases, control the appropriations that are necessary in the provision for clerks or employees in this service or any other service.

Mr. MANN. The Congress will have that authority, I will say to the gentleman, in any event.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say under this phraseology the Secretary of the Interior could impose contract obligations upon the Government without restriction as to the amount of salary.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well; the gentleman is mistaken about that. Of course, if we make a lump-sum appropriation, then the Secretary of the Interior could engage employees and pay them out of the lump-sum appropriation under the terms of the bill. There is no question about that. But if we make specific appropriations he can not do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The very purpose of this amendment is to take away the authority of Congress over the salaries that are paid to these underling employees of this service.

Mr. RAKER. No. The total amount that can be used in the District of Columbia is $8,100.

Mr. STAFFORD. This does not apply to the employees in the District of Columbia, but to those out in the field where they can employ clerks at any salary they see fit. We have not been following that policy in the past. We have been seeking to curb these agencies, and here is a new agency seeking to make an extravagant start beyond that which Congress should authorize.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ASHBROOK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

LIME BARRELS.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I notice that on the calendar the standard lime-barrel bill still appears to be in conference. As a matter of fact, I called up the bill one week ago to-day, and it passed the House. I desire to know why the bill still appears on the calendar?

Mr. MANN. The Senate had already agreed to the conference report?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The present occupant of the chair would not know about that. That would be a matter for the clerks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it is a clerical error.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill was used as a shuttlecock between the two Houses on so many occasions that it is not surprising the clerks lost track of its legislative progress.

BRIDGE ACROSS MAHONING RIVER, OHIO.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17501) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Youngstown, Ohio, to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. There are five typewritten pages.

Mr. BORLAND. It is rather a small document?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Reserving the right to object, I did not understand what the letter is about.

Mr. MONDELL. A letter from the Chief Forester to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] relative to the proposed practice of the department in the expenditure of the funds under section 8 of the national forest road bill.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. A letter written recently by the Chief Forester?

Mr. MONDELL. Some two or three days ago.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is a great demand for this information.

Mr. RAKER. This is a letter that the Chief Forester wrote to Representative TAYLOR after the conference held by the western Representatives, and it shows the method of handling the money and the amount going to each State.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. At that conference the gentleman from Wyoming and practically all the western Representatives were present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

REPLY TO CRITICISMS OF THE SOUTH.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, recently the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] made a speech in this Chamber in which he reflected in a most unfair and unjust way upon the people of and conditions in the South.

I desire to reply to some of his statements. In doing so my language shall be temperate. Whatever resentment I may feel or whatever contempt I may have for the sentiments expressed by the gentleman shall not be voiced in unbecoming language.

The object of the gentleman was, of course, to make political capital for himself and for the Republican Party by an appeal to sectional passion and prejudice.

This is election year; the great parties are engaged in political battle. Realizing that the Republican Party is politically bankrupt in the matter of legitimate arguments against the Democratic administration, he is endeavoring to revivify the corpse of that dear departed old party to which he belongs by giving new life to the old spirit of sectional hate and prejudice. I deplore any effort to destroy the fraternal feeling that has grown up between the people of the North and the South and any attempt to coin malice, malevolence, and hatred into political advantage.

Not simply a partisan speech, it was a wicked speech, in that it traduced millions of good citizens of this country. It was unworthy of the gentleman, unworthy of a Representative in Congress; and I really believe that if he has seriously considered his language since it was uttered he is heartily ashamed of it.

Referring to the Representatives from the South, he said:

Individually they are agreeable, affable, and courteous gentlemen, but collectively, as a political aggregation, they are an abomination in the sight of the Lord.

The complimentary language with which he began the sentence was rendered all the more flagrantly disingenuous by the harsh, sneering, and contumelious reference that closed it. His bouquet of compliment lost all its fragrance in the malodorous fumes of the stinkpots of sectionalism that he opened.

A few years ago, when the bill to locate the Panama Canal Exposition was before the House and a vote was about to be taken to determine whether it should be held at San Francisco, Cal., or New Orleans, La., the gentleman from Illinois used this language:

Mr. Speaker, I desire to advance another reason why New Orleans should be selected, a reason that is wholly sentimental, but which should appeal to every American citizen who cherishes the sacred memories of the past.

Mr. Speaker, we love to talk about a reunited country; we love to feel that sectionalism has disappeared; and so it has, and that every citizen is devoted to that flag whose stars and stripes have been baptized in the best blood of American patriotism.

On the 9th day of April, 1915, will occur the fiftieth anniversary of Appomattox. On that historic day, so full of tender and tragic memories, it is proposed to hold a grand reunion in the city of New Orleans of those who wore the colors that suggest the gray of the morning sky and the blue of full noon, and standing there, 'mid the scenes of long ago, under the folds of the Nation's flag, with hands clasped and hearts overflowing, these grand old heroes of ours will bury forever the last vestige of bitterness growing out of that great conflict.

A sentiment? Yes; a sentiment that should strike a responsive chord in every patriotic American heart, a sentiment whose dramatic fulfillment at New Orleans in 1915 will challenge the lasting admiration of the world.

That was a noble sentiment, admirably and splendidly expressed. Alas! it was so soon forgotten by the gentleman. I had believed that he told the truth when he said that sectionalism had disappeared; and I still believe that it is true, both in the North and the South, except with a few who are so short of vision and narrow of soul that they are unable to grasp the spirit of true fraternity or to rise to the height of true manhood and forget, even for a little time, their own petty, selfish interests or to realize that it is possible for one to have an unselfish love for humanity and every portion of the common country.

In the RECORD of a few days ago I found a speech delivered within the past few days by another gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, in which he touches on the subject of sectionalism. He said:

God save you from the leadership of demagogues who raise false cries with the intent to revive the issues that grew out of the Civil War, when all those problems have been settled, and when there is good feeling in the Northland, as I believe there is in the Southland.

God save you from the leadership of men who would seek to divert your attention from the discussion of those living, wonderful important questions, and who would like to stir up the ashes of a generation gone by.

This was an earnest prayer. Coming as it did from that venerable old gentleman who has seen 80 years roll by, it sounded almost like a benediction. If they would only read what he said, what a rebuke it would be to those who would bring back to mind the hideous ghouls of the past. I earnestly commend its reading to the gentleman, Mr. RODENBERG, and to Hon. Charles E. Hughes, to whom I shall refer later.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] condemned the treatment of negro laborers in the South, and said that—as a rule they are kept in debt by being compelled to buy all their supplies of the plantation or company store, a system of brutal and barbarous servitude that has long since been abolished by law in every northern State.

To use the most moderate language, this expression shows a woeful ignorance of the facts. It is as far from the truth as it is possible to make it. There is no more happy or contented people in the world than the southern negro. It may happen, now and then, that a negro is not treated as he should be, and that he is not dealt with fairly and honestly; but that is the exception and not the rule. I submit that it is unfair and unjust to indict a whole section because of a few isolated instances.

"Brutal and barbarous servitude!" The gentleman has not forgotten the evidence that was produced before a committee of the House since he and I have been Members of Congress showing conditions that existed in certain factories in the great State of Massachusetts. Women and children were employed at such low wages that they were half starved, living largely upon stale bread and molasses, and, although employed in making woolens, they were too poor to own a single woolen garment, the bodies of some of them being clad in the coldest weather in a single thin garment.

Should this be charged up against the whole people of the North or the people of Massachusetts? No; it would be unjust, unfair, and untruthful to do so. As good men and women as there are in the world live there, and I know that such things are just as abhorrent to them as they are to the good people of any other section.

Since the gentleman made his speech I read an article in the Washington Times in which it was stated that prosecutions had been instituted against persons in New York who were engaged in the "white-slave" traffic. It was stated that the assistant district attorney said that he had evidence that young schoolgirls had been enticed into resorts by men and women who made their living by such nefarious and horrible business, and that they were sold for immoral purposes. He also said that "it had become a common practice to weigh these girls and sell them for a dollar a pound."

This is a terrible situation; yet no honest man would think of condemning all the people of that great city for such conduct. Hundreds of thousands of the good men and women there deplore it and condemn it as much as the good men and women elsewhere do.

I have not called attention to either of these matters to gloat over them or to cast reflections upon Massachusetts or New York. I would not have referred to them at all, but all these things have been carried in the press of the country. My desire is simply to emphasize the thought that even if a wrong is occasionally done a negro, the whole South should not have opprobrious epithets thrown at it. [Applause.]

INDUSTRIES OF THE SOUTH.

The gentleman said that the "South is not engaged in manufacturing to any considerable extent." He argued that, representing an agricultural section, the men from the South are not capable of understanding the needs of the other sections of the Nation.

The day after the gentleman spoke an editorial appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer, a partisan Republican newspaper, the first paragraph of which is as follows:

Few persons realize that in the last few years the cotton-growing States have become the greatest users of the raw material for weaving. In the 11 months of the fiscal year up to June 1 the cotton-growing States consumed 20 per cent more bales of cotton in their mills than did all the rest of the country. The showing is more important because the outside States have 50 per cent more spindles than the cotton Commonwealths. The southern percentage is growing each year, and there is no sign of decrease.

It is true that the South is for the most part an agricultural region, yet she is making great progress along manufacturing lines. Our greatest product is cotton; that, next to food, is the most important of all human products. Last year the values of the cotton-plant by-products—seed, meal, oil, and cake—exceeded the value of all the precious metals mined in the United States, including Alaska. Besides this she produced large quantities of grain, tobacco, cattle, and other farm products. Reference is made to these things to show that the contribution of the South to the material wealth of the Nation is not a negligible factor.

During the period from 1904 to 1912, as shown by the report of the Bureau of the Census, the increase in the wealth of the Northern States was 56 per cent and of the Southern States 65 per cent. As this increase was made during a Republican administration it can not be said that it was due to any legislation particularly favorable to the South.

The census report shows that the value of manufactured products in 1909 was greater in Florida than they were in the States of Vermont, Utah, Delaware, Arizona, Idaho, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nevada, New Mexico, and Wyoming; and that the value of manufactured products in Mississippi and Arkansas not only exceed such values in the States named but also in Montana; in South Carolina it exceeds all those States and also Oregon; Alabama exceeds all these States and also Colorado; Tennessee exceeds those States and also Maine, New Hampshire, and West Virginia; Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia exceed those States and also Nebraska; Louisiana and Kentucky exceed those States and also Washington; while Texas exceeds those States and also Iowa.

The last report of the Bureau of the Census shows that for the preceding 10 years the percentage of increase in the value of manufactured products in the Northern States was 45.57 per cent, while in the Southern States it was 90.56 per cent, nearly twice as much. I have directed attention to these statistics to show that the Representatives from the South do have great reason for feeling an interest in legislation affecting manufactures, and really greater interest than the Representatives from many of the Northern States.

It is true that our largest interest is in agriculture; but every good citizen should rejoice over the prosperity that has come to the Nation, regardless of whether it comes as a result of the efforts of the farmer, miner, or manufacturer. That at the present, owing to the war conditions that have caused such a falling off in the chief articles produced in the South—cotton, tobacco, lumber, and naval stores—a greater measure of prosperity has come to the North than to us, does not cause the southern people to indulge in churlish envy of their more fortunate brethren. We do not begrudge it to them, but are glad to witness their adaptability to opportunity to prosper themselves while adding to the wealth of the entire country.

When Mr. Taft was President he made a speech at Atlanta, Ga., in which he paid a splendid tribute to the South. Before I quote from him permit me to say that he is a man for whose honesty, intelligence, and high character I have the highest respect, and that it is my judgment that when the future historian shall write the true history of the man and his work that he will rank high as a statesman—much higher than many of his contemporaries will admit. He said:

The growth of the South in wealth, in education, in civil order, and in civilization has contributed greatly to the growth of the country. By making a greater South you have made a greater country. With what is almost a monopoly in the growth of cotton you have swelled our exports to a point never reached before. By raising in great quantity that which all nations must have and which you only can produce you have increased the dependence of the rest of the world upon American industries. * * * I congratulate you upon what you have done. I congratulate you on your prospects. There is not the slightest tinge of jealousy or envy of your good condition on the part of the northern or western manufacturer. They rejoice with you in your success and in progress more rapid than theirs.

This was the utterance of a statesman whose mind was broad enough to understand that national progress and prosperity do not come from a single section; that each section is measurably dependent upon every other section; who was unselfish enough and honest enough to render the honor due the South; who could rise above the pettiness of sectionalism and factionalism and extend congratulations and good wishes to that part of the country whose inhabitants are, for the most part, not of his political faith. [Applause.]

Statesmen can do these things—really, the ability to do so is one of the qualities that makes them statesmen—men of lesser stature of mind and soul do not possess that ability and see nothing except cause for ridicule and contempt, and nothing worthy of praise or encomium in those who do not agree with them or who do not belong to their own section.

MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEES.

The gentleman also tries to make political capital out of the fact that the chairmen of a large number of the committees are from the South. Mr. Hughes, Republican candidate for President, during his speech-making tour of the West, has commented upon the subject in an effort to create sectional prejudice.

The gentleman from Illinois knows, and Mr. Hughes ought to know, that length of service in the House and on committee very largely determines the question of chairmanships.

It is true that many of these important chairmanships are held by southern men; but that is not the whole truth about the matter, and they fail to state the whole truth. To tell only a part of the truth and leave off the balance of it, intending that a wrong inference shall be drawn, is just as bad as telling none of the truth.

During the present and the two preceding Congresses the Democrats have been in the majority in the House. In that period more than half of the Democratic Members came from the North. Many Democrats from the South served here under Republican administration, and when the Republicans were ousted from power, the chairmanship of several important committees were given to southern Democrats because of seniority of service.

While that is true, it is also true that the positions on the committees given Democrats were divided among the sections so that Democratic representation would be as nearly equal as possible between the North and South. It is a fact that on every committee, except possibly one or two small committees, that there are more men from the North than from the South.

In the Senate there are 73 standing committees. Forty-three of these have a man from the North as chairman. Every section is fairly represented in the membership.

When the Underwood tariff bill became a law the following States were represented on the committee in the House that prepared the bill: Massachusetts had two members, New York had two, Pennsylvania had two, Illinois one, Indiana one, Minnesota one, Ohio one, Iowa one, Michigan one, Nebraska one, Missouri one, Kentucky one, Alabama one, North Carolina one, Tennessee one, Mississippi one, and Texas one. Of the 21 members, only 5 came from the 11 seceding States.

When that bill passed the House and went to the Senate it was referred to the Finance Committee. The following States were represented on that committee: Maine, Indiana, Colorado, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, North Dakota, Utah, New Hampshire, Wyoming, Wisconsin, Missouri, Kentucky, North Carolina, Mississippi, Georgia, and Oklahoma. Of the 17 members, only 3 came from the 11 seceding States.

It will thus be seen that a large majority of the committee came from the North. I do not believe that the country is so much interested in the residence of the chairman or the members of a committee as they are in the character of legislation reported by the committee. The question is not "Where do the chairman or the members live," but "Is the legislation in the interest of the people?"

An examination of the committees of which southern men are chairman will show about the same proportion of members from the two great sections. In each case it will be found that there are more members from the North than from the South; yet these gentlemen do not mention that fact, but simply refer to the chairmanships. Everyone knows that a chairman has only one vote, just as any other member, and for that reason the gentlemen fail to give the facts in regard to membership. To do so would destroy their argument and their chance to arouse prejudice.

FEW APPEALS TO PREJUDICE.

It is very gratifying to me to note, during my term of service here, the spirit of good feeling that exists between the Members, coming as they do from the various sections of the country, and that demagogic appeals to sectionalism are very rare indeed.

It was a matter of sincere regret to me to see reports in the newspapers of such appeals coming from Mr. Hughes. However, yielding to his desire for position and recognizing that his is a desperate case, he has descended to the low plane of appealing to sectional feeling; and, as I have shown in regard to the committees, does so on a false assumption of facts.

There was a time when appeals to passion and prejudice, when waving the "bloody shirt," when denunciation of the people of a section, bore rich political fruit and won political battles. That day, I sincerely believe, is past.

Of course, now and then, there will be men who, being out of touch with the spirit of the times, or having overweening demagogic tendencies, or being unwilling that the embers of hate and prejudice may grow cold, will press the bellows in an effort to make them glow again. My judgment is that such men misjudge both the head and heart of the people of this country; and that they cast an unjust reflection on the intelligence and the kind spirit of those to whom such appeals are made.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely sympathize with a man who harbors a feeling of prejudice, for he is in a truly deplorable condition. I have a contempt for one who, not really entertaining such sentiments, endeavors to inspire them in others, either for personal or political gain.

Prejudice! Hate! Sectionalism! He who would for any reason uproot the bonds of love, sympathy, good feeling, and good-fellowship that exists in a family—and we are all members of the same household, all American citizens—he who would ignite and kindle anew the embers of sectional strife, is an enemy of society and lacking in reverence for the higher and better things of life.

Prejudice is the foe of reason; it is the harbinger of hate; it makes one mentally color blind to facts; it distorts the vision. It makes beauty appear loathsome, honesty look like dishonesty, virtue like vice, strength like weakness. It eats into the very vitals and destroys him who harbors it. It mildews the soul and curdles the very milk of human kindness. Therefore, I repeat, one who seeks to arouse such vile passions is an enemy of society.

Mr. Speaker, I thank God that I believe that there are very few men, North and South, who can be reached by such low, contemptible appeals; that I believe there are so many reasons why the people of the North should honor, love, and respect the people of the South, and that there are so many reasons why the people of the South should honor, love, and respect the people of the North—why they should entertain mutual feelings of esteem and love—that the people of every section will condemn such efforts. [Applause.]

SENTIMENTS OF THE SOUTHERN PEOPLE.

Mr. Speaker, a native son of the South and of the great State of Mississippi, I know that I express the truth when I say that the best of feeling prevails in the Southland for our Northern brethren. Those people have no desire to fight over again the questions settled by the Civil War.

Accepting the arbitrament of the sword, they set themselves to the work of rebuilding their country. The emphasis of their thought has changed from personalities and ill will to social, industrial, economic, and intellectual progress. To-day their minds and hearts are unpoisoned by feeling of hate or desire for revenge; and they can and do sing My County 'Tis of Thee with as much fervor and earnestness as those of any other section. [Applause.]

In this connection I call attention to the language of Jefferson Davis used in a speech made before the Mississippi Legislature just a short time before his death.

> Our people have accepted the decree; it therefore behooves them, as they may, to promote the general welfare of the Union, to show to the world that hereafter as heretofore the patriotism of our people is not measured by the lines of latitude and longitude, but is as broad as the obligations they have assumed and embraces the whole of our ocean-bound domain. Let them leave to their children and their children's children the grand example of never swerving from the path of duty, and preferring to return good for evil rather than to cherish the unmanly feeling of revenge.

This typifies the sentiments that prevail among us. We of the South love our country—the whole of it; we love her free institutions; we are proud of her history and her glory and position among the nations of the world; and we are confident of her bright and successful future.

Inspired by sentiments of love and affection, dominated by patriotic impulses, we can exclaim as honestly and patriotically as can the people of the North, East, or West:

> Thou, too, sail on, O ship of state,
> Sail on, O Union, strong and great.
> * * * * * * *
> Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee;
> Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
> Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
> Are all with thee, are all with thee.

TRADITIONS AND IDEALS OF THE SOUTH.

The gentleman sneeringly remarks that many of us of my section "still cling to the traditions of a dead and buried past." While admitting a strong affection for the traditions and ideals of the South, for those things in them that make individuals and nations great, yet, as I have shown, we are not idealists simply, but are wide awake along practical lines and know something of the needs of the whole country, and that, knowing them, we are ready to do our part so that the future of the Nation may be brighter and better as time shall go by.

It is not my purpose to rehearse the splendid part that the South has played in the building of this great Nation, nor to pay tribute to the illustrious men and women who have spent themselves for the good of their beloved country. This is not the time nor place for such, and, too, it is a theme that none but the most eloquent are worthy of discussing.

Forget these things! Forget the traditions, the ideals of the South! It is asking too much. They can not be forgotten and should not be forgotten. That you may understand why this is true I shall quote what Senator George F. Hoar, a Republican from a Northern State, said several years after the Civil War:

Although my life politically and personally has been a life of almost constant strife with the leaders of the southern people, yet as I grow older I have learned not only to respect and esteem but to love the great qualities which belong to my fellow citizens of the Southern States. They are a noble race. We may well take pattern from them in some of the great virtues which make up the strength, as they make the glories of the free States. Their love of home, their chivalrous respect for women, their courage, their delicate sense of honor, their constancy, which can abide by an opinion or a purpose or an interest for their States through adversity and through prosperity, through the years and through the generations, are things by which the more mercurial North may take a lesson. And there is another thing, covetousness, corruption, and the low temptation of money have not yet formed any place in our southern politics.

Now, my friends, we can not afford to live, we don't wish to live, and we do not live, in a state of estrangement from a people who possess these qualities. They are friends of ours, born of our borning, flesh of our flesh, blood of our blood, and whatever may be the temporary error of any Southern State I for one, if I have a right to speak for Massachusetts, say, "Entreat me not to leave thee nor return from following after thee. For where thou goest I will go, and where thou stayest I will stay also. And thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

Four or five years ago ex-President Roosevelt made a speech to a body of southern men in Atlanta, Ga. Among other things he said:

I earnestly hope that in taking your full share of that material development you will not lose the fine quality of your forefathers. That you will keep their capacity of fealty to a high ideal, their understanding that the things of the body, important though they are, are important chiefly as serving for the foundation upon which the superstructure of a higher life can be built. * * * Remember what your fathers were. Remember to keep alive their spirit, their capacity, their power of devotion to an ideal * * * You are the architects of your own fortunes. When you build up the South you build up the North and West also.

I have quoted from these men who attained great prominence in the councils of the Republican Party and who are numbered among the great men that the Nation has produced that it may be seen how we are regarded by men with statesmanlike views.

No, Mr. Speaker, we will not forget those high and noble ideals. Remembering them, we will be inspired to better efforts in serving the best interests of the Nation. Working in our fertile fields, in the forests, the mines, the manufacturing establishments, and attending to whatsoever business our hands find to do, we will continue to add to the wealth of the Nation and, at the same time, teach our children that theirs is a blessed heritage and that they can be worthy of it only by giving the very best service of body, mind, and soul to our common country. [Applause.]

MR. HUGHES, THE REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE.

I have said something as to the character of the speeches the Republican candidate for the Presidency, Hon. Charles E. Hughes, is making on his tour of the West.

Before the Republican convention he preserved a discreet silence. Like the owl, he acquired a great reputation for great wisdom, and, like that bird, when he opened his mouth he lost that reputation. I imagine the Republicans would be in much better spirits if he had been as close-mouthed after the convention as he was before.

Immediately after word reached him that he had been nominated he wired Chairman HARDING that he would accept the nomination. He began the telegram with these words: "I have not desired the nomination. I have desired to remain on the bench."

I shall not comment on this statement, made in about 15 minutes after he was nominated, except to say that everyone acquainted with the circumstances preceding the action of the convention just "sniggered."

It was a matter of common knowledge that a shrewd game of politics was being played by the "old guard" Republicans in order to prevent the nomination of Roosevelt, and everyone believed that it was being played with the connivance and consent of Mr. Hughes. It was good politics to have him say, "I am not a candidate," and keep his mouth closed on public questions. His friends could enlarge upon his virtues and splendid qualities, his statesmanship, and masterly knowledge of the great questions of the hour. It gave shrewd politicians like Crane, SMOOT, and Hitchcock just the kind of material they needed to work up a sentiment for him. It gave opportunity to play upon the imagination of the country. Here is the candidate for us, his friends say great things for him, and what they say must be true, for he has never uttered one word that contradicts what they say. If Mr. Hughes was really a party to it, he showed himself a large-bore politician.

But the time came when he could no longer sit silent and look wise. The nomination had been won; the campaign for election was ahead. The candidate must speak for himself; he must let the people hear from him. No longer ensconced behind the shell of judicial reticence, he was forced to come out into the open and prove himself to the public.

The Republican newspapers and the party leaders prepared the public for the appearance of a great statesman. They began to tell what tremendous things he would do and what splendid impression he would create when he went into the campaign. "Just wait until Mr. Hughes gets into the campaign," was an expression heard on every side.

Being a Democrat, I listened to these expressions, and, seeing that they were made with such confidence, I became alarmed. I have seen dark clouds gather, with the lightning flashing and the thunder rolling, and, believing that a terrible storm was coming, have stood almost aghast with fear and awe. Then the clouds would brighten, the lightning would cease flashing, the thunder would subside, the storm would fail to come, and my feeling of fear and awe would disappear.

So it was with me when I heard his friends telling us what we might expect when he went on the stump, but when he began making his speeches my fear of any bad effect for the Democratic Party entirely subsided.

What a humiliating spectacle it must be to his Republican friends to witness his efforts in the campaign. The "grand old party," a party that has lived for many years, that has had strong men, veritable giants, for leaders, who were able to go out and give battle to their political adversaries, who could discuss great questions in a statesmanlike manner, who showed, by their utterances, that they were able to cope with the vexing and vexatious problems that arise in a great Nation like ours; I say, what a humiliation to the Republicans who have seen and followed such leaders to hear now the speeches of Mr. Hughes.

The North American, published at Philadelphia, once a Republican paper, later Progressive, and after the nomination of Mr. Hughes friendly to him, said yesterday in an editorial:

Mr. Hughes's letter of acceptance left much to be desired. As to his present speechmaking campaign, not even his most ardent admirers will assert that up to this time he has convinced the waiting public that he possesses exceptional strength. * * * It is undeniable that six years of the cloistered existence of the Supreme Court bench kept him apart from the great issues and changes of that period, and he has much to learn of the forces operating in American life to-day. * * * Another ominous factor is that Mr. Wilson is able to do things, while Mr. Hughes can only criticize and promise.

His speeches prove conclusively that the North American is correct in its statement that he has been out of touch with the great issues of the day and that he is unacquainted with the mighty forces that are operating among us. That paper has stated a fact that is patent to every one who has kept in touch with the issues of the day and who have read his speeches.

He has gone before the country whining around like a whipped schoolboy because a few men that the general public did not know were living, or had ever lived, were not allowed to hold some small official position here in the city of Washington. He endeavors to make a campaign issue out of the fact that one Durand was not retained as Director of Census. He criticizes because a Democrat was placed at the head of the Geodetic Survey.

What does the country care about the name of the man who heads some department? What they are interested in is the character and efficiency of the men that President Wilson appoints to position. The work of the departments is not criticized, and nothing is shown against them. If they are efficient, there is no room for complaint. I am afraid that the gentleman is interested simply in having some friend get the place, that his mind is more on the "loaves and fishes," the spoils of the game, than on improving the service.

He lays great stress on the fact that money has been spent on the improvement of some small river and on the fact that money has been appropriated to construct a public building that he thinks ought not to be built. Grant that these are just criticisms, I submit that they are too small to engage the attention of a candidate for President in momentous times like these.

While having in mind the question of extravagance it may be well to call attention to a statement in the public press to the effect that while governor of New York the expenses of his administration were nearly 34 per cent higher than under the preceding administration. I simply mention that fact; I do not know whether there was any extravagance or not.

Back to his criticisms. A small politician could very well discuss such matters; it would not be expected that his mind could rise above the range of little things; but a statesman, a candidate for the most exalted political office in the world, a man who desires to be the head of such a great Nation and direct the destinies of a hundred million people should have the mentality and breadth of vision that will enable him to comprehend the needs and necessities of such a Nation and to discuss such things in an intelligent manner.

Some one commenting on Mr. Hughes's speeches has described them as being composed of 50 per cent cheap criticism and 50 per cent bid for office, with no per cent of practical solution of what he condemns. I really think that the per cent of criticism was fixed rather low. I notice in the papers that he was greeted several times recently by some one in the crowd calling to him "Hello, Charlie." This was carried in the Republican papers as an evidence of the personal touch that he is giving the campaign. If he continues to make the kind of speeches he has been making, he is likely to earn for himself the name of "Old Criticism" or "Carping Charlie."

THE PEOPLE HAVE THE RIGHT TO KNOW.

If Mr. Hughes has any thing to offer that will advance the interests of humanity, that will lessen the burdens of the toilers, that will promote peace and prosperity, that will increase the glory and prestige of our Nation, that will strengthen our institutions, he should tell the people what those things are.

This is the most important period, probably barring one, through which the Nation has ever passed. There is important work to be done, there are great problems to be met, there are splendid opportunities to be taken advantage of, there are serious dangers to be avoided, and the people are entitled to hear from him on these matters.

Tell us, Mr. Hughes, what your position would have been if the legislation passed by the Democrats had been put up to you. If you would have improved on the laws that have been enacted under Democratic administration, in what way would you have done so?

If the Democratic Party has failed to meet the needs and necessities of the business interests of the country, specify in what particular. What would you have done that would have brought greater prosperity to the Nation?

What would you have done the better to promote the peace and happiness of the people? What would you have done the better to preserve and promote the honor and integrity of the United States?

How would you have dealt with Mexico, with Germany, with England, or any other foreign power, with any assurance that conditions would have improved?

How would you have given stronger assurances to the countries of South America that they have our friendship and that we desire a continuance of those friendly relations? or, what more would you have done to strengthen our trade relations with them?

What more could you have done to insure peace with all the world?

The people would like to know; they are entitled to know. Simply to scoff and sneer, to carp and criticise, does not answer the queries; nor will it satisfy the intelligent voters.

Although he will not give a satisfactory answer to these questions that are of such prime importance to the people, but will continue his discussion of petty matter and will continue his small criticisms, we should not censure him too severely. Like the old fiddler, he is doing the best he can. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The truth of the matter is that there has been so much splendid legislation enacted in the interest of the people of the country since the Democrats have been in power that legitimate arguments against Woodrow Wilson and the Democratic Party are just about as scarce as drops of water in the desert of Sahara, and that is the reason the gentleman has not made more progress on his speech-making tour. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILLMAN). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman and the House for this kindness.

DEMOCRATIC ACHIEVEMENT.

Mr. Speaker, I wish that I had time to refer specifically to the many laws that have passed during this administration, but I can not do so; they are too numerous. I shall mention a few of the more important ones:

The income-tax law was passed so that the wealth of the country might be required to bear its just share of the burdens of Government.

The Clayton antitrust law was passed to more clearly define the Sherman antitrust law, enlarge its provisions, prohibit interlocking directorates, prevent monopolies, and give relief long needed in other respects.

The cotton-futures act was passed in the interest of the cotton farmers of the country.

The rural-credit bill was passed in an effort to give many homeless men and women an opportunity to own a home, by providing means by which money could be borrowed on long time at a low rate of interest.

The Federal reserve act was passed in order that a few great banking houses might not longer control the money and credit of the country, and to insure against panics that are so disastrous to every section of the country.

The good-roads bill was passed because the importance of improved roads was recognized and because it was believed that the Federal Government should aid in this work that would do so much to build up the whole country.

Bills for a Federal Trade Commission, for agricultural-extension work, for campaign publicity, for the various branches of agricultural work, for the improvement of the health of the country, for national preparedness, for the election of Senators by vote of the people, bills in the interest of labor, the warehouse bills, as well as many others, have become the law under the present administration.

The public had been demanding this character of legislation for many years. Although the Republican Party was in power for nearly 50 years, the demand was not heeded. It was often promised, but the promise was never fulfilled.

As soon as the Democratic Party came into power in all the branches of the Government, the cry of the people for relief from oppressive conditions and from industrial slavery was heeded. It was not until our party—a party that has sympathy and enthusiasm for the individual man, that has a broad faith in humanity in general, that opposes class favoritism, that believes in equal rights—came into control, that the shackles of industrial slavery that had been fastened upon the common people were broken, and that we truly became a Government run in the interest of the masses and not the few. Every member of the party who has been true to the trust is entitled to some of the credit.

REASONS FOR DEMOCRATIC SUCCESS.

"The force of the ship is in the trade wind that sweeps it on, and the joy of the sailor is in the harbor toward which he moves." So the force that propels the old "ship of state" lies in the humane, beneficent, the glorious principles of Democracy, as put into effect under the wise and able leadership of Democratic statesmen, under which justice has been put into law, ethics into politics, and greater industrial freedom given the people.

The harbor into which she has proudly sailed is called, and rightly so, "Prosperity," where live those who are enjoying an abundance of food and raimant; where is to be found full opportunity to have all those things that make life seem good and worth the living; and where each one, happy and joyous, may rest secure in the knowledge that as the sun rises in the morning its beneficent rays will fall upon a land undisturbed by the roar of cannon and the rattle of musketry.

Woodrow Wilson is at the helm, and the people feel secure. He has the confidence of the country, because they believe that he has those exalted ideas of justice and benevolence that Washington commended to the country; that he has adopted the policy of "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none," advocated by Jefferson; and that he is imbued with the spirit of Lincoln's splendid utterance, "malice toward none; charity for all."

Mr. Speaker, the Nation is prosperous. We are at peace. No eyes are dim, no hearts are sorrow stricken because of war. The avalanche of murder and bestiality that prevails in so many portions of the earth; the millions of maimed, diseased, and blind; the tears, the groans, the heartaches; the untimely deaths and the millions of newly made graves; the devastations and deprivations that fill all Europe, are enough to make the American people stop and think.

When they do think of these matters, with the shout of "Peace and prosperity" on their lips they will reelect Woodrow Wilson. The result seems sure. I have the utmost confidence in the intelligence of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday next, after the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS], I may address the House for not to exceed 25 minutes upon the subject of Ellis Island.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] on Friday next he be permitted to address the House for 25 minutes on the subject of Ellis Island. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] for 30 minutes.

PENSIONS.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the Democratic party in its platform adopted at St. Louis in June last bragged about its record in having been liberal in granting pensions to the veterans of our country. They not only bragged about it in their platform at St. Louis, but Democratic speakers have taken occasion to eulogize and praise the Democratic Party for what it has done in Congress for the veterans who have served our country. This is another effort on the part of the Democratic Party to deceive and mislead the people in order that it may still enjoy the spoils of office.

The Democratic Party is not satisfied with claiming for itself the temporary and sectional prosperity that we now enjoy, and which prosperity is so blood stained with the maimed and dead of Europe that I am suprised that even the Democratic Party would point with pride to it. The Democratic Party has also, and equally unmerited, laid claim to the fact that this country being out of war is due to the great work of that party, when, as a matter of fact, there has never been any danger of this country getting into war except so far as a weak, vacillating, and an un-American administration has bungled things. The record of the administration as regards Mexico is and has been most disgraceful to the United States and to the civilized world.

But, Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party is so eager for offices for its faithful followers that it does not hesitate to make any false claims possible. The thing is to fool the people. At the last Democratic convention, held in St. Louis in June last, this party wrote into its platform a declaration praising itself for "its record of performance" in granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Nation.

This declaration of the Democratic Party in its convention has been emphasized time and again by Democratic speakers, many of them no doubt believing that that party had really done something along that line. Why, Mr. Speaker, one would think, did he not know better, that all the pension laws on the statute books had been put there by Democratic legislation. The truth is, though, that not a single piece of legislation has been enacted when that party controlled the Congress in both branches and the Executive. The records bear this out, and I have them here to convince all those who want to know the truth and facts.

Mr. Speaker, all the facts are against the Democratic Party. What pension legislation have we passed since the Democratic Party has been in control under the Woodrow Wilson administration? Take, for instance, the Spanish War widows' and orphans' pension bill. It has been pending in the Senate for months and the Democratic leaders there will not allow it to come to a vote. I wonder why? All the Republicans of the Senate are in favor of it, and there are enough Democrats who will vote with the Republicans to pass it. Then, why not do this small act of justice to these poor widows and orphans of our brave soldiers and sailors? Is it because the Democrats fear President Wilson will veto it? Are the leaders of the Democratic Party in the Senate against this act of simple justice and right? It must be one or the other. President Wilson has told the Congress a number of times what legislation he wanted passed before Congress adjourned, but never has he said a word to help the Spanish War widows' and orphans' pension bill. It is very evident now that its passage can only come about when the Republican Party is again in control of the Congress and the White House.

Mr. Speaker, if there is one thing in our national life more than another that is established by the facts of history it is that our liberal pension system was established and has been maintained by the Republican Party. The Republican Party was practically in control of every branch of the Government from the close of the Civil War to 1885. During that time the Republican Party laid well and deep the foundation upon which was built a pension system that testifies nobly to the fact that this Republic is grateful to its Nation's defenders.

Even while the Civil War was in progress the Republican Party enacted that celebrated fundamental pension law, the act of July 14, 1862, which made what was then considered most ample and beneficent provisions for soldiers and sailors disabled in the service, and for their widows and dependents in case of their death. But this great party, mindful of its promises to those who so gallantly went to the front in the dark days of 1861–65, was not satisfied that this act fully acquitted the Nation of its obligations, and ever since the close of the war it has been amplifying its scope, increasing the rate of pensions, providing national homes for the veterans, artificial limbs for those who had lost these members or money commutation therefor, giving them preference in appointments to Government positions, culminating in the passage of the act of May 11, 1912, granting pensions based on age and service. This act was the logical outcome and result in the evolution of pension legislation of its notably liberal predecessor, the act of June 27, 1890, known as the dependent-pension act. These generous enactments had the approval of Republicans in Congress, were signed by Republican Presidents, and in the main carried out by Republican administrations in a spirit of friendship for the old soldiers and sailors and their widows and minor children.

Far be it from me to pass over or to detract from the fact that the act of May 11, 1912, bears the name of that distinguished soldier and Democrat, Hon. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, of Ohio.

I say this in fairness to him. But in equal fairness it should be said that the RECORD will show—the fact can not be successfully controverted—that on the passage of the Sherwood bill in a House in which the Democrats had a majority of 69 only 97 Democrats out of a total membership of 225 voted for the bill, while 130 Republicans voted for it. And of the 93 votes cast against the bill 90 were Democrats. This was in the Sixty-second Congress. The Senate was in control of Republicans. There, on the passage of the bill, 40 Republicans voted for it and only 11 Democrats. All of the votes cast against the bill—16—were cast by Democrats.

On the conference report the vote in the House is equally significant. The conference report was agreed to. Yeas 176, nays 57. Of the 176 votes for the report 99 were Republicans and 77 were Democrats. All but one of the 57 votes against the report were cast by Democrats; the other negative vote was cast by Mr. KENT, an Independent. There was no record vote in the Senate on the conference report. If anybody doubts the accuracy of these figures, let him examine and analyze the votes for himself. They may be found on pages 284, 285, 4015, and 6242 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second session of the Sixty-second Congress.

The bill was approved by a Republican President—Taft—on May 11, 1912.

Mr. Speaker, upon the single fact that Gen. SHERWOOD, a Democrat, reported the age-service pension act from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, every Republican member of which supported it enthusiastically, rests the entire claim of the Democratic Party to the credit of passing that law. Whereas if it had not been for Republicans, who have always consistently been the real friends of the soldiers, the law would not have been passed. Even with the name of the distinguished Gen. SHERWOOD attached to it there would have been no hope of its passage without Republican support. As an individual I give Gen. SHERWOOD all due praise, and I commend the Democrats who followed him. But the action of these individual Democrats is an exception that proves the rule. The historical attitude of the Democratic Party as a party has been and is opposed to a liberal pension system, as shown by the votes of a majority of Democrats in Congress whenever the matter has been put to the test. Because certain individual Democrats have voted now and then for more liberal pensions does not reflect the true position of their party. Certain individual Democrats may justly be proud of their own votes on pension legislation, but they can not point with pride to the record of the Democratic Party as a whole. For that record, covering over 50 years' time, will not sustain their claim. On the contrary, it is not a record of which any Democratic friend of the soldier—even Gen. SHERWOOD himself—can boast or to which he can point with pride.

It is my purpose, as briefly as possible, to review the pension legislation enacted since the Civil War, and by the RECORD to give credit to whom credit is due, without fear or favor. I do this, Mr. Speaker, because the Democratic Party at this late day in the history of pension legislation is pretending before the country to be the only friends of the old soldier and his dependents, ignoring their past party record and closing their eyes to the glorious achievements of the Republican Party on this subject.

Time will not permit me to more than refer by title or substance to the pension laws in chronological order, my chief purpose being to show the respective attitude of the Democratic and Republican Parties as reflected by the votes cast in Congress, where a roll call shows a division of sentiment, to sustain my opening assertion that the Republican Party established and maintained and liberalized our pension system.

I have already mentioned the act of July 14, 1862, which is the chief corner stone in the foundation of the present pension system.

This act was passed by the Thirty-seventh Congress, Republican in both branches, and Abraham Lincoln, a Republican President, signed it. This act specified the rates of pensions for officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines disabled by reason of wounds received or diseases contracted in the service of the United States and in the line of duty. It was broadened and liberalized by later enactments, to which I shall refer in their order of time. At the time this law was passed, in 1862, the total amount paid as pensions was only $852,170.47; in 1865, at the close of the Civil War, we paid $16,347,621.34 to 10,232 pensioners. By 1871 the number of pensioners had increased to 207,495 and the amount paid to $33,077,383.

The act of March 3, 1873, the provisions of which constitute sections 4692–4791 of the Revised Statutes, under the title "Pensions," superseded the law of 1862 and other prior laws. This act, as well as the revision of the statutes, were the work of the Forty-second Congress, both branches being Republican, and the President—Gen. Grant—a Republican.

Up to this time pension legislation was enacted free from party division or contention. It was not until the Democratic Party came into control of the House in the Forty-fourth Congress, 1875–1877, and when that party controlled both branches of Congress in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, 1877–1881, giving it full responsibility for legislation save that the President throughout that period was a Republican, that antagonism of pension legislation by the Democratic Party, or a majority of its members, manifested itself. There were then, as there are now, individual Democrats who voted with the Republicans for liberal pensions, but those Democrats formed a minority of their party.

In the House June 19, 1878, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, the arrears of pension bill was passed under suspension of the rules on a motion by Mr. Haskell, a Republican, by a vote of 164 yeas to 61 nays. The entire negative vote was cast by Democrats. Of the 164 voting for the bill, 116 were Republicans and 48 were Democrats. In the Senate January 16, 1879, the arrears of pension bill passed, 44 yeas, 4 nays. All of the latter being Democrats. Only 16 out of the 44 who voted for the bill were Democrats, while 28 were Republicans. This, too, in a Democratic Congress. The bill was approved by President Hayes, a Republican, on January 25, 1879.

At the next session of Congress (3–45), on February 3, 1879. Mr. Burchard, a Republican, moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill providing for the payment of the arrears of pensions authorized by the act of January 25, 1879, by the sale of bonds. This, requiring a two-thirds vote, was defeated by the Democrats, who cast 81 votes against it, all that were cast against it. One hundred and nine Republicans and only 31 Democrats constituted the affirmative vote.

On February 17, 1879 (3–45), Mr. Sparks (Democrat), of Illinois, reported from the Appropriations Committee and moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill appropriating $25,000,000 for arrears of pensions and $1,800,000 for ordinary pensions, and prescribing graded rates of arrears of pensions. The vote was, yeas 183, nays 67 (two-thirds in favor). Again the entire negative vote was cast by Democrats. The Democratic vote for the bill was only 66, one less than the Democratic negative vote, and 117 Republicans voted for the bill, making possible its passage. When this bill came up in the Senate February 28, 1879, Senator Vorhees, Democrat, of Indiana, offered a new section providing for the payment of arrears of pensions by the proceeds of a bond issue. This was defeated: yeas 22, nays 35. Nineteen Democrats, 1 Independent, and 2 Republicans voted aye, and 27 Republicans and 8 Democrats voted nay.

Numerous other amendments were offered and voted upon, one being agreed to making the law granting pensions to the soldiers and their widows of the War of 1812 applicable to the soldiers and sailors who served in the War with Mexico of 1846. Later this was reconsidered and to it an amendment was offered providing "that no person who served in the Confederate Army during the late War of the Rebellion or held any office, civil or military, in the Confederacy shall be entitled to receive any pension under this act." On a close vote, yeas 24, nays 26, the amendment was defeated, all of the 24 yea votes being Republicans, and 25 Democrats and 1 Republican voting nay.

The bill was passed, 44 to 3, the latter being cast by Democrats.

In the House the Senate amendments which involved no political question were agreed to, yeas 203, nays 61, all of the latter being Democrats.

The bill was approved by President Hayes, a Republican.

President Grant signed the act of August 15, 1876, providing for the issuance of artificial limbs, or commutation therefor, to disabled soldiers and seamen, and providing transportation for the purpose of having the same properly fitted. President Grant also approved the act of February 28, 1877, increasing the pension of those who lost both an arm and a leg.

These two laws were passed by the Forty-fourth Congress, the Senate being Republican and the House Democratic.

Having already shown the adverse attitude of the Democratic Party, when in control of Congress, on the subject of granting arrears of pensions from the date of discharge, it is hardly necessary to say that the act of June 17, 1878, approved by a Republican President, Mr. Hayes, increasing to $72 per month the pensions of those who lost both hands, both feet, or the sight of both eyes incident to the service, was heartily supported by Republicans in a Democratic Congress. The original act of June 18, 1874, granting $50 per month to this class of soldiers was passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President—Grant.

Claim is made by the Democratic Party, or certain of its members, to the pension legislation of this period when the Democratic Party was in full possession of both Houses of Congress. But it is an indisputable fact that on 14 of the most important pension measures passed by Congress from the close of the Civil War to the enactment of the dependent-pension law in 1890 only 417 Democrats voted in favor of those laws, while 648 Democrats voted against them. On the other hand 1,068 Republicans voted for the bills, and not one Republican voted against them.

If any further evidence be necessary to show how a majority of Democrats felt toward the soldiers when Democrats were in power in Congress at the time to which I have referred let me call attention to this fact: On May 20, 1880 (2 to 46), the House voted on an amendment offered by Mr. Aldrich (Republican) to the District of Columbia Code, providing that at least 75 per cent of all appointments hereafter made to the police force, and made prior to January 1, 1885, shall be made from persons who served in the Army and Navy of the United States in the late war and were honorably discharged, and so forth. The amendment was agreed to—yeas 95, nays 78. The affirmative vote was composed of 77 Republicans, 14 Democrats, and 4 Nationals, while all except one of the votes against the amendment were cast by Democrats. The other negative vote was that of a National (G. W. Jones, of Texas).

Again, in the Forty-seventh Congress (1881–1883), the Republicans having a plurality in the House and the Democrats a plurality of one vote in the Senate, David Davis, an Independent, holding the balance of power, to a bill to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, Mr. Robeson (Republican) offered an amendment to strike out the second section of the bill repealing the law giving preference in appointments as policeman or watchman to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States. The amendment was agreed to—yeas 104, nays 77. Seventy-five Democrats, 1 Readjuster, and 1 National voted against the amendment, while only 12 Democrats voted for it. Ninety Republicans and 2 Nationals voted for it. President Arthur (Republican) signed the law of March 3, 1883, increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who lost an arm or leg in the service, passed by the Forty-seventh Congress.

In the Forty-eighth Congress (1883–1885) Republicans controlled the Senate and the Democrats the House. On April 21, 1884, Mr. Warner, of Ohio (Democrat), reported from the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay a bill providing in part a dependent pension to soldiers and sailors, and to pension dependent parents, and moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill. There were yeas 165, nays 57. All of the negative votes were cast by Democrats. Eighty-four Republicans, 79 Democrats, and 2 Independents votes for the bill. The bill was not considered in the Senate.

On January 5, 1885 (2–48), Gen. Keifer (Republican), of Ohio, moved to suspend the rules and agree to the Senate amendment to the Mexican War pension bill. This would have passed the bill finally. But the motion was voted down, not receiving the necessary two-thirds vote, the yeas being 129 and the nays 85. With one exception, that of an Independent, all of the nays were Democrats. Republicans voting aye were 74, Democrats 54, and Independent 1.

By defeating this motion relief to Mexican War veterans was delayed for several years.

On February 7, 1885, in the Senate, an amendment to a private pension bill was agreed to increasing the pensions of widows from $8 to $12 per month. Thirty-one Republicans and 6 Democrats voted aye, and 11 Democrats and 1 Readjuster voted nay.

Another amendment was agreed to on the same day to increase the pensions of dependent parents from $8 to $12 per month—yeas 30, nays 17. All of the affirmative vote were Republicans, and all of the negative vote were Democrats, except one Readjuster. The House did not act on the amendments. The Forty-ninth Congress was divided, the Senate being Republican and the House Democratic—Cleveland (Democrat) was President.

On February 1, 1886 (1–49), Mr. Matson (Democrat), of Indiana, moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill increasing the pensions of widows, minor children, and dependent relations to $12 per month, which was agreed to—yeas 198, nays 66. Again, as on many previous votes, those voting "no" were all Democrats. Republicans furnished 118 of the "aye" vote, Democrats 79, and Greenbacker 1. This is another fair sample of a pension vote in a Democratic House. This bill was passed without a division March 16, 1886, by a Republican Senate, and was signed March 22, 1886, by President Cleveland, one of the few acts of his administration that displayed any degree of friendship for soldiers and their dependents.

The next few years (1886–1890) was a vital and important period in the history of pension legislation. It furnished the real test of friendship for soldiers who were then beginning to feel the effects of the passing years, and many of them were facing the stern realities of old age and poverty. Then it was that a dependent pension was first suggested, based upon the degree of disability to perform manual labor, culminating by the enactment of the dependent pension law of June 27, 1890, by a Republican Congress.

On May 18, 1886 (1–49), the Senate passed, by a vote of 34 to 14, a bill for the relief of soldiers of the late war, honorably discharged after three months' service, who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein.

All of the 14 votes against this pioneer measure were cast by Democrats. Twenty-seven Republicans and only 7 Democrats voted for it. Before the bill passed there were votes on various amendments—one to make the minimum pension $4 instead of $8, on which the Democrats furnished 13 of the 18 votes in its favor, and only 3 of the 22 votes against it.

An amendment by Gen. Logan to make all soldiers' pensions not less than $8 per month was voted down, Democrats casting 20 out of 27 votes against it. All but 2 of the 22 votes for the amendment were Republican votes. A motion to recommit to ascertain how much the bill would cost was disagreed to, 14 to 28, all of the 14 in favor being Democrats and 24 of the 28 against being Republicans.

The bill went to the Democratic House, where a substitute was reported from committee, but no further action was taken.

Two other important bills were passed by the Republican Senate at that session (1–49), one increasing pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or leg in the service, and the other increasing the rate of pensionable period therefor. Neither of these bills were acted upon by the Democratic House.

At this session also the Democrats in the House proposed a new rule for taxation for the payment of pensions, which Mr. Reed (Republican) moved to lay on the table. This was voted down, 127 to 139, every negative vote being Democratic. Ten Democrats voted with 117 Republicans to lay the rule on the table. The Republicans resorted successfully to filibustering to prevent further consideration.

During this period (49th Cong.) President Cleveland vetoed 123 private pension bills and "pocketed" 21. These vetoes were referred to the Committee on Pensions and Invalid Pensions. On several occasions Republicans moved to add instructions that the committee make report by a day stated, but these motions were defeated by a party vote. Ten cases were reported back favorably and one adversely. Ten of these came to vote on reconsideration and only one was passed over President Cleveland's veto.

The votes in the House and Senate were as follows, two-thirds required for passage:

	For passage.			Against passage.
	Republicans.	Democrats.	Greenbackers.	Democrats.

Twenty-five Senate bills were vetoed, all of which were reported from the Senate Committee on Pensions faborably, but only two were voted upon.

On January 17, 1887 (2–49), Mr. Matson (Democrat), of Indiana, moved to suspend the rules and pass the dependent pension bill. The Matson bill was substantially the bill which had been reported from the Invalid Pensions Committee at the previous session as a substitute for the more liberal bill passed by the Republican Senate. The Senate bill fixed $24 per month as the maximum rate of pension; the Matson bill reduced this to $12 per month for total inability to perform manual labor, and failed to provide for lesser rates.

The bill was passed—yeas 180, nays 76. This was the first vote taken in the House on a dependent pension bill, the analysis of which shows, just as in the case of the Sherwood bill, that the bill could not have passed in a Democratic House without Republican votes. The negative vote of 76 was solidly Democratic. Sixty-eight Democrats (8 fewer than the total negative vote) voted for the bill and 111 Republicans and 1 Greenbacker were recorded in its favor.

The bill passed the Republican Senate January 27, 1887, without a division.

Then, on February 11, 1887, President Grover Cleveland, a Democrat, returned the bill to Congress with a veto and a long message stating his objections to it. He was ably answered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the members of which took exceptions to many of his statements, especially the one that "there exists a widespread disregard of truth and good faith" in the prosecution of pensions claims. That committee recommended that the bill be passed over President Cleveland's veto. This required a two-thirds vote. The vote was taken on February 24, 1887, and resulted—yeas 175, nays 125, not the necessary two-thirds; so the bill failed. The 125 Members voting against the bill and to support the President were Democrats, every one. On the other hand, 136 Republicans voted for the bill and to override the veto, and only 38 Democrats and 1 Greenbacker voted with them.

Thus a Democratic President and a Democratic House showed unmistakably the hostile attitude of that party toward liberalizing the pension laws.

There was then, as now, a notable individual exception to his party's position, in the person of Hon. Courtland C. Matson, of Indiana, chairman of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions. He was a staunch and able friend of the old soldier, but in this he was not in harmony with the Democratic Party.

Undismayed by President Cleveland's veto, the Republican Senate in the next Congress (50th, 1887–1889) proceeded early (February 27, 1888) to pass a dependent pension bill. Again the opposition came wholly from Democrats, the negative vote, 16, being all Democrats. Thirty-one Republicans and 13 Democrats, a total of 44, voted for the bill. Beyond the reporting from committee in the House of a substitute for the Senate bill, no further action was taken by the Democratic House.

Thus the opportunity for the Democratic Party to go on record in favor of a dependent pension law, when that party controlled the House in the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and Fiftieth Congresses (1883–1889) and the Presidency from 1885 to 1889, passed away, and it remained for a Republican Congress and a Republican President to do for the soldiers what the Democratic Party had failed to do.

Before leaving the Fiftieth Congress to take up the constructive pension record of Republicans in the Congress following, I desire to refer to President Cleveland's vetoes of private pension bills during that Congress and to the antipathy of the Democratic Party toward a liberal pension system.

To the pension appropriation bill Mr. Conger (Republican), of Iowa, offered an amendment in the House, which was agreed to, providing "that in all pensions to widows payments shall be made from the date of the death of the husband."

A more comprehensive provision was recommended by the Senate committee, to wit:

That all pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, granted under the general laws regulating pensions to widows in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall commence from the date of the death of the husband.

On May 17, 1888, Mr. Cockrell (Democrat), of Missouri, moved to strike from the proposed amendment the words "have been, or," making the operation prospective; that is, to apply to pensions thereafter granted instead of to those already granted. This was disagreed to—yeas 20, nays 23. All of the "ayes" were Democrats and all of the noes but one were Republicans. The broad and liberal provision of the committee was then agreed to and became the law. This law gave thousands of needy and deserving widows back pension from the time of the death of their husbands.

In the Fiftieth Congress, covering the last two years of President Cleveland's first administration—1887–1889—he vetoed 127 private pension bills and "pocketed" 26, making a grand total of 297 of this class of bills vetoed and "pocketed" by him in four years. Prior to this the number of presidential vetoes of all kinds, from Washington's administration to Arthur's, inclusive, was only 109. President Cleveland vetoed altogether 304 bills, of which 251 were pension bills, 250 private and 1 public—the dependent pension bill.

Of the private pension bills vetoed in the Fiftieth Congress none were brought to a vote on reconsideration.

This is the record of a Democratic President and of the Democratic Party in Congress, when they had a chance to do something for the Nation's defenders, which I commend to the careful consideration of latter-day Democrats who now profess to stand as the only simon-pure champions of the old soldier. I submit that it is not a record of which men like Gen. SHERWOOD and Courtland C. Matson, or any other individual Democratic friend of the soldier can be proud.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us turn away from Cleveland and his vetoes and the antagonism of the Democratic Party in Congress toward pension legislation and look upon a brighter side of the picture. Let us examine the record of the Republican Party in the Fifty-first Congress, and of Gen. Benjamin Harrison, a Republican, in the White House. Here we will find the promise fulfilled to the hope as well as made to the ear.

The Republican Party, in its national platform of 1888, upon which Gen. Harrison was elected President of the United States, and upon which a Republican Congress was elected, contained this declaration and promise:

THE PROMISE.

The gratitude of the Nation to the defenders of the Union can not be measured by laws. The legislation of Congress should conform to the pledge made by a loyal people, and be so enlarged and extended as to provide against the possibility that any man who honorably wore the Federal uniform should become the inmate of an almshouse or dependent upon private charity. In the presence of an overflowing Treasury it would be a public scandal to do less for those whose valorous service preserved the Government. We denounce the hostile spirit of President Cleveland in his numerous vetoes of measures for pension relief, and the action of the Democratic House of Representatives in refusing even a consideration of general pension legislation.

THE PROMISE FULFILLED.

Soon after the organization of the Fifty-first Congress a comprehensive dependent pension bill was formulated and reported to the Senate by Senator Davis (Republican).

This bill was entitled "A bill granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents." What it provided, what it accomplished, and how it was administered by the Republicans I shall show further on. I want now to record its passage through Congress. Remember this, in substance, is the bill against which the Democratic Party voted and which President Cleveland vetoed.

On March 31, 1890, the bill came to a vote in the Senate. Forty-two Senators voted for it—32 Republicans and 10 Democrats. Twelve Senators voted against it, all of them Democrats. Before this vote was taken several amendments were voted down, including one by Senator Vest (Democrat) providing an income tax for the purpose of raising the money necessary to meet the appropriations made by the bill. The Vest amendment was laid on the table—yeas 29, nays 17. Only 1 Democrat voted with 28 Republicans to table the amendment, while 16 Democrats and 1 Republican voted against tabling.

When the bill came up in the House—April 7, 1890—on a motion of Mr. Morrill (Republican), chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to suspend the rules and pass the same with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the motion was defeated (two-thirds being required)—yeas 169, nays 87. The entire "no" vote was made up of Democrats, with one exception. Mr. Moore, a Republican, of New Hampshire, voted "no." Afterwards, on the passage of the bill, Mr. Moore voted for it. One hundred and thirty-four Republicans, 34 Democrats, and 1 Independent voted for the bill.

On April 30, 1890, the bill again came up and was open to amendment. The Morrill substitute, section 1 of which provided for service pension and fixing 62 years as the minimum age, was pending. This was amended on motion of Mr. Cheadle (Republican), of Indiana, by making the minimum age 60 years. The Morrill substitute was then agreed to—yeas 183, nays 71. The entire negative vote save one (Brower, Republican, of North Carolina) was composed of Democrats. One hundred and forty-three Republicans and 40 Democrats voted for the substitute.

On the final passage of the bill the yeas were 179 (Republicans 142, Democrats 37), nays 71 (Democrats 70, Republican 1; Brower of North Carolina).

The title of the bill was amended in conformity with the age-service provision by making it read:

An act providing for a service pension for the soldiers of the Rebellion and their widows, and for other purposes.

The bill then went to a conference committee of the two Houses, where it underwent some changes, including the restoration of the original title.

The statement made by the House conferees as to the changes is as follows:

The effect of the changes made by the conferees is to substitute the bill in relation to dependent parents, passed by the House January 30, for the first section of the Senate bill, and the second section of the Senate bill is amended by striking out the dependent clause and inserting the word "manual" before the word "labor"; also by making a graded rate of from six to twelve dollars instead of the fixed rate of twelve. The service-pension sections of the House bill, granting pensions to widows, is retained. The section of the Senate bill pertaining to pension attorneys is retained.

The House agreed to the conference report June 11, 1890—yeas 145 (Republicans 117, Democrats 28), nays 56 (all Democrats).

The Senate agreed to the conference report June 23, 1890—yeas 34 (Republicans 31, Democrats 3), nays 18 (all Democrats).

The bill was approved and signed by President Harrison on June 27, 1890, a day in the history of pension legislation, known to soldiers and soldiers' widows throughout the Nation for the last 26 years as the day on which was fulfilled the promise of the Republican Party—

To provide against the possibility that any man who honorably wore the Federal uniform should become the inmate of an almshouse or dependent upon private charity.

This was the most far-reaching pension legislation enacted after the close of the Civil War, and recognized a higher obligation of the people to their disabled veterans than was ever before formulated into law. Previous to 1890 pensions for service in the Civil War were granted only to those who were wounded in the service or who had contracted some disability therein, and likewise pensions were granted only to widows, minor children, and dependent parents of those who died from injuries received or disabilities contracted in the service. The act of June 27, 1890, granted pensions to all persons who served 90 days or more during the Civil War and who were disabled from earning a support by manual labor from disabilities not due to vicious habits, without requiring the applicant to prove that the disability or disabilities were incurred in the service. The act also granted pensions to dependent widows of all such persons without requiring them to prove that their husbands died of wounds received or disabilities contracted in the service. The rate of pension under the act of June 27, 1890, was from $6 to $12 per month to the survivors of the Civil War in accordance with the degree of disability and $8 per month to all widows.

Before passing on to other liberal pension legislation enacted by the Republican Party, I want to show how the act of June 27, 1890, was administered by Democratic and Republican administrations, to the great disadvantage of soldiers and widows under the former and with liberality and justice by the latter.

When the act was first passed the Commissioner of Pensions promulgated the following order, No. 164:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., October 15, 1890.

In regard to fixing rates of pensions under the act of June 27, 1890:

That all claimants under the act of June 27, 1890, showing a mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, and which incapacitate them from the performance of manual labor, rendering them unable to earn a support in such a degree as would be rated under former laws at or above $6 and less than $12, shall be rated the same as like disabilities of service origin, and that all cases showing a pensionable disability which, if of service origin, would be rated at or above $12 per month, shall be rated at $12 per month.

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Approved:

CYRUS BUSSEY, Assistant Secretary.

The administration of the act of June 27, 1890, continued under the operation of this liberal order until a Democratic administration abrogated it and issued in its place the following order, No. 225:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., June 9, 1893.

As to adjudicating and fixing rates of pensions under the act of June 27, 1890:

1. A claim for pension under the second section of the act of June 27, 1890, can only be allowed upon proof of mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of the claimant's own vicious habits, incapacitating him for the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support.

2. No specific injury or disability can, as such, have a pensionable rating under that act, nor be considered otherwise than as it affects the capacity of the claimant to perform ordinary manual labor.

3. Proof that the disability is not the result of the claimant's own vicious habits is requisite; and therefore the causes and circumstances of the origin of the disability should be shown by the evidence furnished in support of the claim for pension, so far as can be done, and by persons other than the claimant.

4. To give the claimant a pensionable status under this act the disability must be such as to incapacitate him for the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support, yet the act recognizes differences in the degree of such pensionable disability, giving $12 per month in case of the greatest and $6 per month in case of the lowest degree of such pensionable disability rendering the claimant unable to earn a support by manual labor. It also provides for intermediate ratings proportioned to the intermediate degrees of such pensionable disability. The proper ratings under this act will therefore be made in accordance with such rules for rating as the medical referee shall prescribe, subject to the approval of the commissioner.

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

Approved:

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

The effect of this technical and illiberal order was that many deserving soldiers could get no pension at all under the act of 1890, and some got less than they deserved. The change in the construction of the law was the result of Democratic unfriendliness to pension legislation and a disposition to reduce the number of pensioners on the roll. Mr. Cleveland had come back into power breathing threatenings and slaughter against pensioners, and in his message of 1893 to Congress declared that "thousands of neighborhoods had their well-known fraudulent pensioners." And so a general and indiscriminate campaign was entered upon by Mr. Cleveland's administration against the men and women on the pension roll. An army of special pension examiners were put into the field; 60,000 Democratic postmasters were used as spies, scouts, and guides; all the multitudes of Democratic newspapers brought up their heavy artillery and joined in the bombardment; and at least $1,000,000 were expended in the tremendous effort to brand almost every pensioner as more or less a fraud and almost every person trying to get a pension as trying to perpetrate a fraud.

What was the result? How many fraudulent pensioners were found as the result of all this tremendous accusation and searching investigation? Only 39 out of 970,000 pensioners. Never was so serious an accusation found to have so little foundation in fact.

Another distinctly hostile act of the Democratic Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Lochren, was his interpretation of the obnoxious order No. 225, that disabilities should not be combined so as to establish the minimum rating of $6 per month. This, however, raised such a protest that it was withdrawn by order No. 241, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., September 2, 1893.

The circular of June 12, 1893, in respect to rating cases under the act of June 27, 1890, is withdrawn.

Hereafter in affixing rates under this act the medical referee or the medical officer in the board of revision shall weigh each disability and determine the degree that each disability or the combined disabilities disable the claimant from earning a support by manual labor, and a rate corresponding to this degree shall be allowed.

In cases in which the pensioner has reached the age of 75 his rate shall not be disturbed if he is receiving the maximum, and if he is not a pensioner he shall receive the maximum for senility alone, if there are no special pensionable disabilities shown.

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

During the first year of that Democratic administration the amount paid for pensions fell off $16,000,000 as the result of the unfriendly orders and practice of the Pension Bureau.

The former Republican ruling friendly to widows was also changed.

Ruling 241 of Commissioner Raum, of May 12, 1891, was as follows:

In considering the testimony alleging that the widow is without other means of support than her daily labor, it is proper to keep in view the fact that the support contemplated by this act includes both shelter and raiment for the widow and children of the deceased soldier who are dependent upon her. When it is shown that the income of the widow is inadequate for such support, and that she is dependent for the same upon her daily labor, the pension should be granted.

Under this ruling widows with incomes of $300 or less were granted pensions, but when Mr. Cleveland came into the office of President his Commissioner of Pensions, William Lochren, changed this ruling as to widows, as he also changed the ruling as to soldiers, and denied a pension to widows, under the act of 1890, whose income was $96 a year or more. Later, under a Republican Congress, the amount of income was fixed by law at $250.

Mr. Speaker, when William McKinley was elected President and the Republican Party again came into power in 1896 Maj. McKinley told Commissioner Evans "to be generous within the limits of the law," whereupon Mr. Evans reinstated, in accordance with the law giving preference to ex-Union soldiers and sailors in the matter of appointments, 157 ex-Union soldiers who had been discharged under former administrations, besides promoting 287 of those now employed in the bureau. He also reinstated 23 ex-Union soldiers in the different agencies and promoted 29 to higher places, and in addition reinstated and promoted 64 widows and orphans of deceased soldiers.

One of the first official acts of Commissioner Evans was to revoke the obnoxious orders of his Democratic predecessor, for which action he received the thanks of the National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The act of June 27, 1890, was then interpreted in the most liberal manner possible.

Under Commissioner Ware, a Republican and ex-Union soldier, an order was issued, the famous Order No. 78. This order said that when a man arrived at the age of 62, instead of piling up affidavits in the Pension Bureau establishing this or that infirmity, it should be presumed—as a matter of fact—that a disability existed that entitled him to $6 a month, and when he reached the age of 65 years it should be presumed that he had certain other disabilities which entitled him to $8 a month.

No single act of that Republican administration aroused such determined opposition from the Democratic minority in Congress as this order, which I will insert here in full:

PENSION BUREAU ORDER IN RELATION TO PRESUMPTION OF DISABILITIES ARISING FROM AGE.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 15, 1904.

The COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

SIR: Your letter has been received, submitting for my consideration an order touching the rate of pension allowed under the act of June 27, 1890. The order in question is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
March 15, 1904.

ORDER No. 78.]

Whereas the act of June 27, 1890, as amended, provides that a claimant shall "be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support, and in determining such inability each and every infirmity shall be duly considered, and the aggregate of the disabilities shown to be rated"; and

Whereas old age is an infirmity the average nature and extent of which the experience of the Pension Bureau has established with reasonable certainty; and

Whereas by act of Congress in 1887, when 39 years had elapsed after the Mexican War, all soldiers of said war who were over 62 years of age were placed on the pension roll; and

Whereas 39 years will have elapsed on April 13, 1904, since the Civil War, and there are many survivors over 62 years of age: Now, therefore,

Ordered (1). In the adjudication of pension claims under said act of June 27, 1890, as amended, it shall be taken and considered as an evidential fact, if the contrary does not appear, and if all other legal requirements are properly met, that when a claimant has passed the age of 62 years he is disabled one-half in ability to perform manual labor, and is entitled to be rated at $6 per month; after 65 years at $8 per month; after 68 years at $10 per month; and after 70 years at $12 per month.

2. Allowances at higher rate, not exceeding $12 per month, will continue to be made as heretofore, where disabilities other than age show a condition of inability to perform manual labor.

3. This order shall take effect April 13, 1904, and shall not be deemed retroactive. The former rules of the office fixing the minimum and maximum at 65 years and 75 years, respectively, are hereby modified as above.

E. F. WARE,
Commissioner of Pensions.

In response thereto I have to state that one copy of the order has been approved by indorsement thereon and is herewith transmitted for the files of your office.

Very respectfully, E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

The feeling among Democrats in Congress against this liberal construction of the law, a construction which was within the always acknowledged competency of the department, took form in a resolution offered by Mr. Cockran—Democrat—in the Fifty-eighth Congress, authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire and report whether the order was a usurpation or invasion of the powers of Congress. This resolution was reported from the Committee on Rules April 9, 1904, and Mr. Dalzell—Republican—moved to lay it on the table. In a heated debate Republicans contended for the validity of the order, while certain prominent Democrats declared against and criticized it.

On a close vote—yeas 103, nays 100—the resolution was tabled. All of the 103 voting "aye" were Republicans; 97 Democrats and 3 Republicans voted in the negative.

Two years afterwards Order 78 was confirmed by the act of April 24, 1906, as follows:

That the age of 62 years and over shall be considered a permanent specific disability within the meaning of the pension laws.

It is a well-known fact that during the 16 years from the Fifty-fourth to the Sixty-first Congresses, when the Republican Party was in control of Congress and the Presidency our pension system was still further and greatly liberalized, action in the Pension Bureau simplified and expedited, and that the policy in Congress grew more and more liberal in private pension legislation. It was by Republicans that the simpler method of omnibus private pension bills was inaugurated, the only opposition thereto coming from a few Democrats.

Mr. Speaker, the fundamental laws, the most far-reaching laws, and the great preponderance of pension laws under which we are operating to-day were passed by Republicans, and even such laws as were passed by Democrats when they controlled either House of Congress received solid Republican support, which can not be said of the Democratic Party, either when it was in power or when it was out of power.

In the Fifty-second Congress, the House being Democratic and the Senate Republican, the following were the bills considered and the votes thereon:

Bill relating to the execution of declarations and other papers in pension claims, April 12, 1892. Vote on passage: Yeas 162, nays 23, not voting 143. The negative vote was all Democratic. Affirmative vote: Republicans 43, Democrats 110, Populists 9. The Democrats had a majority in the House of 148.

Bill granting pensions to Army nurses, June 28, 1892. Vote on passage: Yeas 125—Republicans 45, Democrats 73, Populists 7. Nays 56—Democrats 55, Populist 1.

Pension appropriation bill, March 7, 1892, Mr. Grout—Republican—moved to increase the appropriation for Army and Navy pensions from $133,000,000 to $144,000,000. Rejected. Yeas 70—Democrats 10, Populists 6, Republicans 54. Nays 162—Democrats 161, Populist 1.

Pension appropriation bill: Amendment to exclude payment to any person in receipt of an income of $1,000 a year, February 7, 1893. Rejected. Yeas 125—Democrats 124, Populist 1. Nays 134—Republicans 64, Populists 8, Democrats 62.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. During the period from 1893 to 1897, when Cleveland was President and the House was alternately controlled by Democrats and Republicans, President Cleveland vetoed many more private pension bills, bringing his total of such vetoes to 550 for his two terms.

Presidents Lincoln, Johnson, Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Arthur, Harrison, McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, all Republicans, did not veto a single pension bill.

Next in importance to the dependent-pension act was the act of February 6, 1907, also passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President, granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico. Under this act any person who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late Civil War or 60 days in the War with Mexico and who was honorably discharged is entitled to a pension of $12 per month on reaching the age of 62 years, $15 per month on reaching the age of 70 years, and $20 per month on reaching the age of 75 years.

The legislation next in importance to be passed by a Republican Congress was the act of April 19, 1908, to increase the pensions of widows, minor children, and so forth, of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late Civil War, the War with Mexico, the various Indian wars, and so forth, and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late Civil War. Under this act all widows, minors, and helpless children on the rolls at a less rate were increased to $12 per month, and the widows of those who served 90 days during the Civil War and who received an honorable discharge therefrom are entitled to pension under this act, provided they were married prior to June 27, 1890, dependence not being considered. This act granted an increase of pension to some 200,000 widows and children of deceased soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and the War with Mexico and the various Indian wars. Pensioners were not required to file an application in the Bureau of Pensions to secure the increased rate provided by the act of April 19, 1908, as the pension agents were instructed to pay all pensioners on the roll affected by this act at the increased rate at the first quarterly payment occurring after the passage of said act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to the so-called Sulloway bill of the Sixty-first Congress, which passed the House and failed in the Senate. That bill was an age-and-service bill; it required a minimum service of 90 days and allowed very liberal rates of increase. The bill passed the Republican House without a record vote. It has been contended by Democrats that the Republican Party was responsible for its failure in the Senate. This is untrue, and in support of what I say I refer to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], who is as familiar with the facts as he is with pension legislation, having had long experience in such matters both in the Pension Bureau and in Congress.

Mr. LANGLEY, on May 18, 1914, said:

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows repeated efforts of Republican Senators to get the bill considered and passed and that these efforts were blocked by Democratic Senators. I ask you to look at page 2883 of the RECORD of February 18, 1911. Senator Scott, of West Virginia, a Republican, asked unanimous consent to take up the bill, and Senator OVERMAN, a Democrat, from North Carolina, objected. Thereupon Senator Scott moved to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection. There were 49 votes in favor of this motion, and 46 of them were Republicans; there were 35 votes against the motion, and 28 of them were cast by Democrats. The RECORD also shows that the action of the Democratic Senators prevented a final vote on the passage of the bill at that time. Again, on the 4th of March following (see pp. 4320–4321 of the RECORD), the last day of the session, and the last chance the bill had to become a law in that Congress, a Republican Senator, Mr. CURTIS, of Kansas, asked unanimous consent to take up the bill, and objection was made by Mr. GORE, a Democrat, from Oklahoma. A Republican Senator then moved to take it up notwithstanding this objection, and the vote on that motion showed practically the same political alignment as it did on the other occasion referred to, on February 18. I wish that every soldier in the country and their relatives and friends knew the exact truth about the entire procedure in connection with that bill.

Mr. Speaker, coming down to the last prominent piece of pension legislation—the Sherwood Act of May 11, 1912—I will only reiterate what I said in the beginning, that this law would never have passed a House with a Democratic membership of 225 and a clear majority of 68, without the aid of Republicans. I have given the figures to prove this statement. And the further facts are that the bill was passed by a Republican Senate and signed by a Republican President.

Mr. Speaker, actions speak louder than words. Belated declarations of latter-day Democrats can not change the record. Our splendid pension system, which has no precedent in the world's history, and no peer in justice and generosity among the nations of the earth, is a distinctively Republican institution.

Words are but leaves;
Deeds are fruits.
Words are easy, like the wind,
Faithful friends are hard to find.

The Republican Party points to its deeds in behalf of the Nation's defenders and their widows, as a guaranty that it still holds to the sentiment which on a great banner met the gaze of the soldiers and sailors of the Union Army and Navy who marched down Pennsylvania Avenue, in this city, May 27, 1865:

There is one debt this Nation owes which it can never pay; that is the debt it owes to its soldiers and sailors.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] for 40 minutes.

THE NATIONAL CAMPAIGN.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker—

A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill,
Men whom the spoils of office can not buy,
Men with opinions and a will,
Men who have honor, men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before the demagogue and scorn his treacherous flatteries without winking,
Tall men—sun-crowned—who live above the fog in public duty and in private thinking

Such a time as this demands men large enough, brave enough, and true enough to place our country's welfare above the lust for public office and political advantage. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Such a time has no place for the petty demagogue, the sectional firebrand, or the partisan agitator.

Such a time teaches that men and women of all sections united and patriotic should strive to quiet impending conflicts, hush the wrangling of creeds, harmonize conflicting interests, and make every section a stronger fabric in the Nation's life. Such a time calls upon men of all classes and creeds to give themselves for the peace, the happiness, and the prosperity of this people—united as never before, loving and honoring one flag, working for one purpose, and worshiping one God. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is a pitiable aspect in this twentieth century to see men in high positions encouraging the Republican candidate for the Presidency under baneful influences to seek to rekindle the flames of sectional strife, as he belittles the high office to which he aspires in a vain effort to be benefited by sectional bitterness.

It is regrettable to see a man retire from the highest court in the land and destroy himself by his own blundering hand; but Mr. Hughes is not wholly to blame for the low order of his campaign speeches, for he has been for many years removed from the activities of men, and must necessarily take dictation from those who are vainly seeking the return of a discredited Republican control of the Government.

In a State legislature some years ago a member representing the county of Buncombe was making a speech. A majority of the members left the chamber, and the speaker paused and said to those who remained, "You may go, too, if you wish; for I am only talking for Buncombe."

The brilliant and eloquent gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], who made a speech in this Chamber on August 4, evidently for a Republican campaign document, made statements so extravagant and unfounded that it is evident that he was "only talking for buncombe." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Knowing that the Republican candidate for the Presidency is a cold, austere man, afflicted with a superabundance of inflated egotism, his advisers insisted that he put pep into his speeches. He evidently read the speech of the gentleman from Illinois delivered "only for buncombe" and thought it was pep. [Laughter.]

When the Republican candidate for the Presidency discovered that a certain unknown Republican in the Geodetic Survey had lost his job, he immediately seized upon the loss of that Republican job and made it one of the foremost issues of a national campaign. He thought that was pep.

When the Republican candidate for the Presidency was told that a good Republican job in the Census Bureau had been lost he seized upon that incident, attacking the Democratic appointee, and made this the next great issue in a national campaign. He thought that, too, was pep, but the people of the country know it is buncombe. The American people who have had dealings with William J. Harris, the Democratic appointee, will render the unanimous verdict that as a patriotic statesman of purpose and power, that as a man of force and ability, and that as a man possessing superior skill and expertness in business, William J. Harris, by whatever standard the two may be measured, is the peer of the Republican candidate for the Presidency. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Forgetting that the Republican Party for 16 years had complete control of the Government and utterly failed to make adequate preparation for our national defense, forgetting that the Republican Party is wholly responsible for the condition of our Army and Navy, and not knowing that more has been done for preparedness in the Sixty-fourth Congress than during the 16 years of Republican control, the Republican candidate for the Presidency denounces the preparedness program of this Congress as inadequate and incomplete. He had to say something to catch Mr. Roosevelt. In the next breath he howls extravagant appropriations. He thinks that is pep. He is inconsistent and insincere enough to shout for more preparedness and in the next breath denounce appropriations for preparedness.

The extravagance to which Mr. ex-Justice Hughes refers includes appropriations for the Army and Navy made necessary by 16 years of Republican misrule and neglect, and appropriations for the farmers, including the rural-credits act, the good-roads act, labor legislation, agricultural extension, the conservation acts, and the ship-purchase act to provide a market for farm products. He calls it extravagance, but the people of the country know that it is just, proper, and legitimate support of the farmer, the laboring man, and the industrial interests of the country. Which of the above acts would he repeal? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He evidently does not know that under Republican control more than the total expenditures of this Congress was donated to the special interests from the public domain in the form of land grants. How will he and his party meet this fact?

When the Republican candidate for the Presidency, while still a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the most nonpartisan and exalted position in the world, taking advantage of the high standing in the community of a well-known woman's college, slipped over to that noble institution, placed typewritten copies of his speech in reach of the newspaper reporters for the Chicago convention then in session, delivered a speech in honor of the flag, then stole away and waited breathlessly to be shocked and surprised by "the unexpected" notice of his Republican nomination, he evidently thought it a shrewd and cunning scheme to bring himself prominently before the Republican convention, but the American people think it was a most remarkable act for a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States to take advantage of a great woman's college to begin his cheap and partisan political campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the Republican candidate for the Presidency rejected his own party platform and announced for a Federal amendment for woman suffrage in a vain effort to make the women of the country believe that he is anxious to give them equal opportunities, he evidently thought that that was the most pep that he had used, but, Mr. Speaker, let the women of the great city of New York answer the Republican candidate in this political expediency of his. Let the women of the city of New York tell the women of the country how Mr. Hughes's honeyed words now square with his acts while governor of New York. In that great city there was a demand to pay for the same service equal salaries to women and men in the teaching profession. The women teachers of New York City had clamored for years for the same pay as men, provided they did the same quality and amount of work. The legislature of that State in 1907 passed such a bill. What did the present noisy would-be champion of women do when governor of New York when he had a real opportunity to act? He vetoed that bill in the following language:

STATE OF NEW YORK, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Albany, May 29, 1907.

To the senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, senate bill No. 1218, entitled "An act to amend the Greater New York charter in relation to the fixing of the salaries of members of the supervising and teaching staff of the public schools of the city of New York."

The board of education of the city of New York consists of 46 members, appointed by the mayor for terms of five years, respectively. They are excepted from the general provisions of the charter authorizing the mayor to remove public officers holding by appointment from him whenever in his judgment the public interest shall so require, and are removable only upon sustained charges. While styled the head of an administrative department, the board of education, by the terms of the charter, possesses the powers and privileges of a corporation. As such it sues and may be sued. It has the management and control of the public schools and of the public-school system of the city, subject only to the general statutes of the State relating to public schools and public-school instruction and to the provisions of the charter. It has power to establish schools, to appoint administrative officers, principals, heads of departments, and teachers, and to adopt by-laws and regulations for the proper execution of its duties. It also has the power to fix the salaries of all members of the supervising and the teaching staff, subject to the provision that there shall be established a uniform schedule providing for an equal annual increment and that the salaries and annual increments paid to men and women, respectively, shall not be less than specified amounts.

The board of education annually submits to the board of estimate and apportionment an estimate of the moneys needed for the entire school system during the next succeeding year, and the board of estimate and apportionment is required to appropriate for the general school fund an amount not less than 3 mills on every dollar of assessed valuation of the real and personal estate in the city of New York liable to taxation. The board of education administers all moneys so appropriated, subject to the general provisions of the charter relating to the audit and payment of salaries and other claims by the department of finance, and in case the amount appropriated exceeds the amount needed the surplus becomes part of the general school fund for the following year.

Apart from the power of the mayor to appoint and remove as stated and the duty of the city to supply the funds required, the board of education exercises its powers independently. It is not subject to control by the city authorities. There is no contract or official relation between the teachers and the city. The city can not be sued upon the contracts made by the board. This results, as the court of appeals has said, from "the settled policy of the State from an early date to divorce the business of public education from all other muncipal interests or business" and from the creation of the board of education as a corporate body "to conduct a system of public education in a designated division of the State and manage and control the schools therein." (Gunnison v. Board of Education, 176 N. Y., pp. 16, 17.)

The board of education is thus directly subject to the control of the legislature, and whatever provisions may be found necessary or wise for the purpose of defining its powers or prescribing its policy must be prescribed by the legislature. No other authority is competent to make such provision.

But while the legislature has power to deal with every phase of the matter, the course which experience approves is that certain general principles of action should be laid down, and that within these principles freedom with reference to details of management should be left to the subordinate body acting with peculiar knowledge of local conditions.

When the so-called Davis law was passed in 1899, it was thought important to the educational interests of the city that certain minimum salaries for teachers should be prescribed, as well as minimum annual increments, presumbaly to improve the service. In these prescribed minima wide differences appear between the amounts payable to men and to women. These control the board of education only as minimum requirements, but the practice has been to pay women less than men, and under the by-laws adopted by the board glaring inequalities now exist.

The motive of the present bill is to compel equal pay for men and women holding the same positions under any particular schedule of salaries. The provisions of the bill relating to classification, schedules, and the raising of additional funds by taxation turn upon this central requirement and are for the purpose of giving it effect. And inasmuch as the question is one of general principle it is claimed that it is a requirement proper to be established by the legislature in laying down the rules under which the board of education shall exercise its powers.

Now, without taking up the alleged ambiguities of the bill, it clearly appears, with respect to this fundamental matter, to be open to serious objection.

It is proposed by legislative enactment to establish the proposition that for the work of a given position women shall receive equal pay with men. It is for this principle that the supporters of the bill contend and not for mere increased pay. The gross inequalities which have been permitted by the board of education, and which clearly should not be continued, are pointed to for the purpose of emphasizing the principle in question.

The proposition as it is put—"equal pay for equal work"—is an attractive one, and set forth on behalf of the worth, public servants who are engaged in this important calling it has elicited a large measure of support, while at the same time it has provoked vigorous opposition from those who believe that the desired legislation would be unfortunate both for the schools and the women teachers.

But it is manifest that the principle is one of general application, and it should not be adopted by the State unless the State is prepared to apply it generally. The question is necessarily one of State policy, and as such it should be presented and debated before action is taken.

There is no reason why the principle should be applied to teachers in New York and not to those in Albany, Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, and elsewhere in the State, nor is there any reason why it should be limited to school-teaching. If sound, it should be applied in our State hospital service, in our charitable and reformatory institutions, and generally through the civil service of the State. It is indefensible that a principle of grave importance to the State as a whole should be established in connection with a local measure inviting only the consideration which as such it receives. The consideration of such a matter should be under circumstances directing the attention of every member of the legislature to its importance with reference to his own constituency and to the State at large, and not upon the assumption that it is a question of purely local concern.

What local authorities or subordinate boards may do within the limits of their discretion, while locally important, is a very different matter from the establishment by legislation of a principle of action which has no appropriate local limitation. By acting in such matters through local bills the State finds itself committed to a course which, as State policy, has never received thorough consideration.

For this reason I can not approve this bill. The matter should be left to the board of education to be dealt with locally as may seem best, unless the legislature is prepared to lay down the general principle for the entire State and the entire public service.

(Signed) CHARLES E. HUGHES.

He refused to give the women of his own State justice in the matter of earning a living. How far can the women of the country trust him now? [Applause on the Democratic side.] He was not willing then to give the women of his own State an equal chance to earn a living, but he is anxious now to fool them into voting the Republican ticket. A few months ago the question of woman suffrage was voted on in New Jersey and New York. President Wilson had the frankness and the courage to go to New Jersey and vote for suffrage, but Mr. Ex-Justice Hughes sat in Washington and did not feel interest enough to go to New York and cast his ballot. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In fact, has Mr. ex-Justice Hughes cast his ballot in six years? Has he not for six years failed to exercise the highest right and duty of an American citizen, the right of suffrage? Mr. Speaker, does this record of Mr. Hughes reveal statesmanship or demagogy? Let the women of the country answer in the next November election. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the Republican candidate for the Presidency is not the candidate of the monopolistic interests of the country, let him explain why, while governor of New York, he vetoed the full-crew bill. Let him try again to explain why he protested against the Federal income tax amendment. In view of his frantic efforts to win support in the Middle West, let him explain his astounding and amazing veto of the 2-cent railroad-fare bill. Read his veto message in part in the following language, and decide for yourselves what his political alignments are:

STATE OF NEW YORK, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Albany, June 11, 1907.

To the assembly:

I return herewith, without my aproval, assembly bill No. 2269, entitled "An act to amend the railroad law, in relation to rates of fare."

This bill, with specified exceptions, provides for a maximum passenger fare of 2 cents per mile upon the railroads in this State. Steam railroads less than 150 miles in length which are not within the counties of New York and Kings, or within the limits of an incorporated city, are permitted a higher maximum charge of 3, 4, and 5 cents a mile according to length of line, unless through consolidation, lease, or control they form part of a system whose combined lines exceed 150 miles, in which case the provision for a maximum rate of 2 cents a mile is applicable.

I do not mean to be understood as saying that a maximum 2-cent passenger rate would be unreasonably low. It might be high enough in many cases. Possibly it would be high enough in all cases. I fully appreciate the fact that those who have promoted this bill believe that such a rate would be fair. But I deem it most important that the policy of dealing with matters of this sort arbitrarily, by legislative rule of general application without reference to the demands of justice in particular cases, should be condemned. Every workingman, every tradesman, and every citizen believing himself to have aught at stake in the prosperity of the country, should determinedly oppose it. For it not only threatens the stability of business enterprise which makes our prosperity possible, but it substitutes unreason for sound judgment, the ill-considered demands of resentment for the spirit of fair play, and makes impossible patient and honorable effort to correct abuses.

* * * * * * *

If this bill were to become a law, it would most probably lead in many cases—on account of pretended or real necessity—to economies in service and to readjustment of rates now lower, to the annoyance and injury of considerable numbers of the traveling public for which the gain to others would not necessarily compensate. Again, the validity of such a statute would almost certainly be contested in protracted litigation, the result of which, to say the least, would be in doubt. At a critical time, when the interests of all demand that reason and judgment should control in dealing with such matters, we should have abandoned our true line of action and facilitated still wider departures.

I therefore disapprove this bill.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

When President Wilson settles the impending railroad strike, which he will in the interest of the American people, Mr. ex-Justice Hughes had better come on home, save his vested interest backers further expense, and retire to private life, to which obscurity he is surely going with perfect safety.

The Republican candidate for the Presidency reveals a shocking, amazing, and humiliating lack of information when he says:

> The river and harbor bill, known to the people as the pork-barrel bill, is largely moneys wasted, as there is no expert examination to determine what expenditures are needed. * * * That is a matter of logrolling. It brings the blush of shame to the cheeks of every American. It ought to be stopped. If I am elected President, to the best of my ability I propose to stop it.

He also calls attention to the fact that the men at the head of these committees in the House and the Senate are both southern men, in an effort to raise the question of sectionalism in his criticisms of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, no other bill in the whole legislative program is as carefully safeguarded against fraud as is the river and harbor bill. No project is adopted unless approved by the Engineers of the Army and by the Chief of Engineers. First, by authorization of Congress a preliminary survey is made of each project by the district officer, a report is made to the division engineer, then to the Board of Engineers, then to the Chief of Engineers, whose report is final. If unfavorable, it ends the matter. If favorable, it goes back to the district officer for final survey and estimate of cost, then back again to the division engineer, to the Board of Engineers, and to the Chief of Engineers. It is clear to every intelligent citizen that every precaution is taken against needless expenditures.

In the river and harbor act passed by this Congress there are numerous instances where this principle of caution by the Government has been emphasized. After the bill passed the House the Senate added $50,000 for Key West Harbor and it was stricken out in conference because the project had not been surveyed. It was stricken out by the chairman of the committee, Mr. SPARKMAN, near whose home in Florida the harbor is located. For the Sabine-Neches Canal in Texas, near the home of the second member of the committee, $70,000 was stricken out because no survey had been made. Another item of $25,000 for Arcadia Harbor in Michigan was stricken out for the same reason, thus showing that every item in this bill does actually have expert examination in advance, which fact, in view of his own statement, reveals the stupendous ignorance and inexcusable demagogy of the Republican candidate for the Presidency.

He calls it pork and insinuates that it is largely southern pork. The river and harbor act passed by this Congress carries $40,598,135. It carries for the perfectly loyal southern State of Maryland $21,000 and for the northern State of New York $2,500,000 in direct appropriations and authorizes $1,100,000 to be expended later, thus carrying to the State of New York three and one-half million dollars, 166 times the amount appropriated for Maryland.

This bill carries for the southern State of North Carolina $267,600, while the northern State of Michigan receives $1,500,000. This bill authorizes the expenditure of $2,500,000 for continuing projects, while not a penny of this sum goes to any southern State. Of the $42,886,085 appropriated and authorized, exactly 39.2 per cent goes to the Southern States. It is clear, therefore, that if this bill is pork that a large part of the hog goes into the northern sections of our country and a good fat ham goes to the home State of the Republican candidate for the Presidency. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am glad to see the liberal and just appropriations go to all sections of our great country to improve our rivers and harbors. I voted for it, because when it comes to national legislation I am a citizen of the Republic and of no one section of the country. [Applause.]

The charge is made that the civil service, "kept sacred by the Republicans," has been raided by the Democratic Party and that too many Democrats have been appointed to office.

During the 16 years of Republican rule employees in the Government service were supposed to have secured their positions through civil-service examination, and yet the startling fact stands forth that during these years over 75 per cent of the people who secured such positions were Republicans and less than 25 per cent were Democrats. In some departments 90 per cent were Republicans. If the Republicans were nonpartisan, how can they explain this absurd inequality in the civil service? Even now, under Democratic rule, an overwhelming majority of the chiefs in the departments of the Government, who recommend promotions and practically control appointments in the departments, are Republicans. Of the 119 chiefs of divisions under Republican rule in the Department of the Interior exactly 99 are now holding the same position, and not one of the 20 changes was made for political reasons.

I take the Post Office Department as an example, because in that department are about 87 per cent of all the Federal employees of the country. The Republican Party took the chief inspector of that department out of the classified service. The present Postmaster General secured an executive order and had him put back into the classified service. Four years ago there was not a Democratic post-office inspector in charge. To-day there are eight Democratic and eight Republican inspectors in charge, thus making that department nonpartisan.

Four years ago there were 300 Republican post-office inspectors, with only 39 Democrats in the service. Certain States were not represented at all. The doubtful States had most of the inspectors under Republican rule. To-day every State is getting equal representation and the nonpartisan spirit pervades the Post Office Department to an unreasonable degree. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The present Postmaster General has repeatedly recommended that second and third class post offices be placed in the classified service and that all applicants, including the present postmasters, be required to take a civil-service examination. A Republican President placed fourth-class post offices in the classified service, but covered in the 40,000 Republican postmasters whom he had appointed without examination, and he also covered in all assistant postmasters in the first and second class post offices practically all of whom are Republican and have never been examined. Mr. ex-Justice Hughes is evidently not aware of this Republican outrage.

The present Postmaster General made an ironclad rule that no Republican postmaster can be removed for pernicious political activity by the mere formality of charges. They must be proved, and no action is taken until he receives the report of an inspector, and most of the inspectors now are Republicans, for which injustice to the Democrats of the country the Postmaster General is responsible.

For two years the Postmaster General kept in office in this administration the Republican Second Assistant Postmaster General, and still retains him in the service in another position, because he is efficient, when there were numerous equally competent Democrats who should have had that position under a Democratic administration.

Under the law one of three eligibles may be appointed to a fourth-class post office or as rural carrier, but the present Postmaster General has embarrassed Members of Congress with their constituents by not recognizing any statement affecting appointment except that which bears directly upon the man's residence or character. He has refused repeatedly to consider any letter urging other reasons for the appointment of fourth-class postmasters or rural carriers. The records of the Post Office Department show that 89.5 per cent of these appointments have been taken from the first on the eligible list, 8 per cent have been taken from the second on the eligible list, and 2.5 per cent have been taken from the third on the eligible list, thus showing that the Postmaster General has given scant attention to the Democrats on the eligible list unless they happened to be first.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, the weakness of this administration is that it has kept too many Republicans in office. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The position of the administration is that great parties are builded not upon patronage but upon service through constructive legislation.

The Postmaster General is irrepressible on the subject of efficiency. A Member of Congress can not even get a hearing from him on any question in the Postal Service except on efficiency. He has been instrumental in disappointing and discouraging many of the Democrats of the country by following vehemently his policy of keeping "efficient" Republicans in office far beyond the time that they had any just claim to such office. A clean sweep of Republicans for the good of the service should have been made three years ago. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The most worthy of our citizens are the old soldiers; yet the Postmaster General has issued an order or request that he does not wish anyone recommended for postmaster who is over the age of 65, thus sacrificing the old soldiers upon the altar of efficiency.

The Department of Agriculture is another example. More than 90 per cent of the employees in Washington in that department under civil service are now Republicans, and all the bureau chiefs with one exception are Republicans. The chief clerks of the various bureaus, who have the making up of the efficiency lists from which promotions are made, are to the best of my knowledge all Republicans.

The present chief clerk of the department was for 16 years stenographer and private secretary to Hon. James Wilson, former Republican Secretary of Agriculture, at a salary of $2,500 per annum. When the Democrats came into power he was made chief clerk, at a salary of $3,500 per year, an increase of $1,000.

The Democrats in the Department of Agriculture, on account of civil-service rules, have received scant consideration for the last three years. When there was a vacancy the promotion has gone to a Republican, because Republicans, who secured their positions under corrupt Republican rule, were in charge of the machinery as to the fixing of the ratings of the clerks.

Another method adopted by the Republicans in charge is to assign a quality of work to the Democrats that is 'uferior, so that no matter how hard the Democrats may strive to obtain a good rating it is impossible to do so.

Among the supervising officers of the department there is one real Democrat having authority (not in the classified service, but appointed by the President), and he is the Assistant Secretary, Hon. Carl Vrooman, of Illinois, but matters relating to the rank and file are not referred to him. Under a Democratic administration the Department of Agriculture is Republican, which proves that the civil service has not been raided by the Democratic Party, as Mr. ex-Justice Hughes charges. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Take the record of the Bureau of the Census as another emphatic proof of the false and absurd partisan and silly charges of the Republican candidate for the Presidency. Complaint was made to the National Civil Service Reform League, of New York City, that Hon. William J. Harris, Director of the Bureau of the Census, had not observed the rules of civil service in the matter of making appointments. Mr. Harry W. Marsh, assistant secretary of this league, came to Washington for the purpose of making a thorough investigation of these charges. Mr. Harris welcomed his coming and voluntarily directed his chief clerk, his private secretary, and the appointment clerk to cooperate with Mr. Marsh fully, to allow him full access to all records in regard to appointments, and to see to it that he obtained information wanted in every particular. Mr. Marsh did make a thorough investigation, and at its conclusion he was of the opinion that the charges were untrue, unwarranted, and unjustified. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Under date of August 18, 1916, Mr. Harris sent Mr. Marsh the following telegram:

Mr. HARRY W. MARSH,
Assistant Secretary National Civil Service Reform League,
79 Wall Street, New York, N. Y.:

While Director Census I was charged with violating civil-service rules in appointments. I voluntarily directed chief clerk, secretary, and appointment clerk to show you complete records. Thorough investigation proved charges untrue and unjustified, and you complimented my observance of civil-service rules. Please wire me immediately corroborating above facts.

(Signed) W. J. HARRIS.

The following is Mr. Marsh's reply:

NEW YORK, August 18, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS,
Federal Trade Commission,
Commerce Building, Washington, D. C.:

Glad to corroborate statements in your telegram of even date.

(Signed) HARRY W. MARSH.

The brilliant orator and gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], whom the South once thought its friend, says: "The southern Democrats collectively are an abomination in the sight of the Lord." That statement is to laugh, for recent and prospective Democratic successes show that the Lord pays scant attention to Republican demagogic gyrations and appeals for votes, especially when their candidate's record as governor of New York proves him inseparably connected with vested interests. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Illinois further says:

"The American people are in some respects a peculiar people. They are always restless, and they are never entirely satisfied. They are constantly looking forward to something new, and when they have found it they are willing to experiment with it simply because it is new, and especially is this true when everything is moving along smoothly and there are no signs of impending disaster in the skies. It is then that the demagogue appears upon the scene. It is then that the agitator flourishes. It is then that successful appeal is made to passion and to prejudice and seeds of discontent are sown in fertile and productive ground. It is then that the finger of suspicion is pointed at everybody and everything, and men for the first time in their lives question the honesty and integrity of their friends and neighbors. It is then that honor is assailed, that motives are impugned, that confidence is destroyed."

This is the cue the Republican candidate for the Presidency seized upon—to play the demagogue in an effort to arouse sectional strife and to "point the finger of suspicion to everybody and everything" in this hour of unprecedented prosperity brought to the country by Democratic constructive legislation. Mr. Hughes would turn the attention of the country away from the real issues of the campaign to Mexico, but he has not the frankness or the courage to say what he would have done in Mexico or what he would do if elected. Would he intervene and plunge our country into the midst of the world war? Would he send the sons, the brothers, the husbands, and the sweethearts of the country to face the storm of conflict against musketry and shell on bloody battlefields in foreign lands? In all fairness and decency, let him say what he would do. He offers nothing to the country except to offer himself for a job. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He makes a vain effort to have the country believe that we are kept out of war by some miracle and not by the President's superior diplomacy; that our amazing prosperity is caused by the European war, and that when the period of reconstruction comes after the war ends the old discredited Republican Party could handle the business of the country better than can the efficient, purposeful, and virile Democratic Party. In all his lumbering circumlocution he has not suggested one intelligent reason for such claim. He knows, but has not the courage or the sincerity to admit, that the Democratic Party has a masterful grasp of world conditions and has the ability and the purpose to handle them as no other party could. The American people, whose faith in President Wilson and the Democratic Party grows stronger day by day, will answer him in November by perpetuating Democratic control. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But for the moment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] forgets his partisanship and says:

"Having full control of the Government, the Democratic Party is properly chargeable with full responsibility for everything that has been done or left undone, and they can not escape that responsibility."

The Democratic Party readily accepts the responsibility for all that has been done, and its glorious vindication by the American people is not three months away. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again he says, and Mr. ex-Justice Hughes as usual reechoes the partisan sentiment:

"The Republican Party and the Republican Party alone has always been the one true and genuine national party. * * * Having control of all the committees, the South to-day exercises a dominating influence in national legislation."

During the last years of Republican control there was not a committee chairmanship from the South. Was that nationalism or blind ignorant partisanship?

Let us see what kind of legislation a Democratic Congress charged with being dominated by southern Members has enacted. If the legislation enacted is sectional or partisan, the Republican candidate might find something above the peanut politician's class to criticize, but if it is national in scope and purpose the people will send him back to private life and rejoice that a man of such caliber as he is now displaying is removed from the Supreme Court of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let the people decide whether the following great measures enacted by this so-called South-controlled Congress are sectional or national:

The Underwood tariff law, just to the consumer as against the special privileged class, followed by a nonpartisan tariff commission removing the tariff question from politics.

The income-tax law, causing the rich to pay their just proportion of the expenses of the Government.

The rural-credits law, the first legislation solely for the farmers.

The establishment of rural routes, the extension of the parcel post, and better mail service for our rural population.

The good-roads law for all sections and for all our people.

Farm-extension laws, including Smith-Lever Act, grain and cotton standards, regulating cotton futures, and so forth.

Numerous just labor laws, the most beneficial in a century by the American Congress.

The child-labor law for the children of the whole country and for civilization.

The Federal reserve act, giving an elastic currency and preventing financial panics—the greatest act ever passed in the history of our Government.

Conservation acts for the people as against special interests.

Antitrust laws and arbitration laws, preventing special-interest control.

Shipping act for open markets for our products and commercial mastery of the seas.

Federal Trade Commission act, protecting the individual as against the vested interests.

The seamen's law for the workmen, and public safety.

Legislation supporting the President in keeping us out of the European war while maintaining peace with honor to the American flag.

Mr. Speaker, for the sake of the great dignity of the high office he seeks and in the name of common decency, let Mr. ex-Justice Hughes specify and name the sectional measures in the above list and mention those he would repeal.

His speeches are the pitiable wailings of the personal representative of the special vested monopolistic interests, crying in the wilderness, seeking to be saved from the just retribution he and his party are to receive in November at the hands of the American people.

Compare such an insincere, trimming politician as the Republican candidate by his own words proves himself to be, with the scholarly, brilliant, courageous, nonpartisan, frank, purposeful, consecrated world citizen, Woodrow Wilson, the candidate of the Democratic Party. There can be no doubt of your decision to continue him in office and keep our country in honorable peace, our Government efficient, and our people prosperous and happy. Thank God for Woodrow Wilson, prosperity, and peace! [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized for 45 minutes.

COMMERCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL PROSPERITY.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, no political party should be retained in national power whose economic policies do not promote the industrial growth of our country, the expansion of our commercial interests, and the enlargement of the various business enterprises in which our people are engaged. It matters not what other virtues a political party may have, it should not be perpetuated in national power unless its economic policies are favorable to the production of wealth by our people. In directing the affairs of nations there is no substitute for policies which promote the production of wealth and the preservation of that wealth for the people who produce it.

We hardly realize to what extent the activities of our National Government are related to wealth in some of its phases. We legislate with a view to the conservation of wealth, the taxation of wealth, the regulation of wealth, the dissemination of wealth, and the creation of wealth.

Our national wealth should be conserved; it should bear its equitable share of taxation; when controlled by large corporations it should be properly regulated; so far as possible, it should be equitably distributed among those who produce it; and every nation should follow those economic policies which will promote the production of wealth by its citizens. Legislation along all these lines is important. But a nation must produce wealth before it can be conserved, before it can be taxed, before it can be regulated, and before it can be distributed.

In its early history the Republican Party rendered inestimable service to the country in the mighty struggle for the preservation of the Union. No less conspicuous and creditable was the part it played in the cause of human liberty and freedom. But with the Union preserved and human slavery abolished, the Republican Party in later years achieved its greatest successes through its wise and sound financial and economic policies. These policies have been most favorable to the production of wealth. When the Republican Party came in power in 1861 the entire wealth of this country was estimated at only $16,000,000,000. The Department of Commerce in a recent bulletin places the present wealth of this country at $187,000,000,000.

There has been much said in recent years about the regulation and control of wealth. However important this may be, the production of wealth is a greater problem. Logically the first thing is to adopt and pursue national policies that will insure the production of wealth. Herein lies the great superiority of Republican economic policies over those of its chief and long-time antagonist, the Democratic Party. Whatever other merits the Democratic Party may have, its economic policies are not favorable to the production and accumulation of wealth, and this is sufficient reason why it should not and will not long hold national power.

The chief sources of wealth in the United States are agriculture, manufacturing, and commerce. Agriculture and manufacturing are the two great producing industries of the Nation. Fully two-thirds of all our wage earners are employed therein. Seventy millions of our population are directly supported thereby. In a large measure all mercantile, transportation, and commercial interests are dependent thereon.

Democratic economic policies, with a tariff for revenue only as the chief exponent thereof, are unfavorable to the production of wealth in agriculture, in manufacturing, and in trade with foreign nations.

When the present Democratic administration made the Underwood tariff bill a law, it meant that every producer must share his home market with foreign producers.

Now, the 8,000,000 of men who are employed in our manufacturing establishments are vitally interested that their products shall have a market wherein they can be sold at reasonable prices. The 6,500,000 farmers are interested in having a market wherein their products will sell at good prices. Neither those who produce manufactured articles nor those who produce farm products can be benefited by surrending a part of their home market—their best market—to foreign producers. But this is what the Underwood tariff law compelled them to do. The Underwood tariff law put cattle, hogs, sheep, corn, broom corn, wheat, rye, potatoes, milk, eggs, all kinds of meats, wool, wheat-flour bread, and other products of the farm on the free list. It greatly reduced the tariff on practically all farm products. In the main the reductions are so great as to leave no protection to American farmers. This gives the farmers of Canada, of the Central and South American Republics, of Australia and New Zealand, and of all other countries free access to the markets of the United States. Before the European war began farm products from some of these countries were sold in the markets of the United States in large quantities. The European war has made an enormous demand for the surplus farm products of all non-European countries. For the time being farm products are selling at good prices. But the war will end.

Then will come the flood of beef and corn and wheat and other farm products into the markets of the United States. That this will tend to lower the prices of farm products there can be no question. A reduction of 5 per cent on the price of all farm products would mean an annual loss to the farmers of the United States of $500,000,000. We have passed a rural-credit bill, perhaps the most important measure passed by Congress in recent times. But a rural-credit law that would loan money to farmers without interest would hardly compensate the farmers of the United States for what they will lose if free trade in farm products becomes the permanent policy of the United States. And it is not the farmers alone who are interested. We are expending vast millions to enlarge our Military and Naval Establishments. But the party in power is pursuing a policy which makes us depend on other countries for our food supply. This country should feed its own people. We should pursue a policy that will develop, expand, and enlarge our agricultural interests and make us self-sufficient as a Nation. This is the policy of the Republican Party.

Mr. Speaker, commerce aids both agriculture and manufacturing. It promotes the production of wealth in both of these great industries. Profitable trade with foreign nations transfers wealth produced in other countries to the permanent wealth of our own people. Unprofitable trade with other nations transfers the wealth produced by our own farmers, mechanics, artisans, and wage earners to the permanent wealth of other nations. Every great nation in the world is seeking to add to its wealth through profitable trade with other nations. Supremacy in the commerce of the world is the ambition of every great nation. The object of promoting foreign commerce is to make money for our own people. For years we have been talking about the necessity of a merchant marine. The purpose of building a merchant marine is to extend our trade with foreign nations. However, if foreign trade is unprofitable the less we have of it the better.

Here are a few propositions which to my mind are self-evident:

We grow rich by what we sell abroad, not by what we buy abroad.

To make foreign trade profitable we must sell abroad more than we buy abroad.

When our imports exceed our exports we are doing business with other nations at a loss.

The excess of exports over imports represents what other nations are contributing, through trade relations, to the permanent wealth of this Nation.

The excess of imports over exports represents what we contribute to the permanent wealth of other nations.

In our exchanges with other nations, a favorable trade balance means profit, and an unfavorable trade balance means loss.

An unfavorable trade balance and the export of gold are danger signals, invariably signifying that there is something wrong with our economic policies.

Through a long series of years, in their application, it has been demonstrated beyond a question of a doubt that the economic policies of the Republicain Party are favorable to the production of wealth.

With equal certainty it has been shown that the economic policies of the Democratic Party are not favorable to the production of wealth. Herein, is the fatal defect in the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Prior to the ascendency of the present Democratic administration to power, this Nation enjoyed the most profitable foreign trade in all its history—a foreign trade more profitable than any other nation had ever enjoyed.

Democratic management of national affairs and Democratic economic policies, prior to the outbreak of the European war, completely destroyed that profitable trade and reduced us to the point where we were actually doing business with other nations at a loss. Excluding Europe, where war orders dominate our trade, we are to-day doing business with all the rest of the world at a tremendous financial loss to the American people. The truth of these assertions is demonstrated by the official trade statistics of the Nation.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, compared with 1913, our imports increased $80,917,423 and our exports decreased $101,305,001. For 1914, compared with 1913, our purchases abroad were increased $80,917,423, our sales abroad were decreased $101,305,001. Our favorable trade balance was reduced $182,222,424. This vast wealth was lost to this country, just the same as if it had been consumed in a great conflagration, or swept away by a mighty flood, or destroyed by an earthquake.

But only eight full months of 1914 were under the tariff-for-revenue-only policy. As a further test, let us examine our foreign-trade statistics for the seven months in 1914, immediately preceding the outbreak of the European war, compared with the corresponding seven months in 1913.

For the seven months immediately preceding August 1, 1914, compared with the corresponding seven months in 1913, our imports increased $121,944,698 and our exports decreased $125,814,446. In the seven months of 1914, compared with 1913, there was a net loss in our favorable trade balance of $247,759,144. That is what our tariff-for-revenue-only policy cost the people of the United States during the seven months of foreign trade of 1914. It represents an average monthly loss of $35,000,000 and an annual loss of $420,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.]

That is what occurred when times were normal, when trade conditions were natural, when foreign commerce was unrestricted, when the world was at peace and there was full and free competition between the great nations in the markets of the world. We come now to consider our foreign trade since the outbreak of the European war.

Excluding Germany and Austria-Hungary, the European war has greatly stimulated our exports to practically all other European countries. Upon our trade with European countries the war has had the effect of a protective-tariff policy. It has restricted imports and stimulated exports. It has made our trade with Europe enormously profitable. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, the last fiscal year preceding the European war, our favorable trade balance with all European countries amounted to $590,895,861. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, our net favorable trade balance with Europe was $2,382,930,680. Our net favorable trade balance for that year with all the world was only $2,135,775,355. Outside of Europe for 1916 we lost in our foreign trade $247,155,325. In 1913, under a protective-tariff policy, with the world outside of Europe we had a favorable trade balance of $66,667,538. Going from a favorable trade balance of $66,667,538 to an unfavorable balance of $247,155,325 means an annual loss of $313,822,863. In our trade with non-European nations in 1916, compared with 1913, we lost $313,822,863.

Let us examine our trade with non-European countries covering the entire three years in which the Democratic Party has been in power. Compared with the favorable trade balance in 1913 the net loss in our favorable trade balance with all North American countries in 1914 was $154,223,746; in 1915, $251,473,423; and in 1916, $114,474,869. The total net loss in our favorable trade balance with all North American countries in these three years, compared with 1913, was $520,172,038.

The net loss in our favorable trade balance with South American countries for these three years was, for 1914, $26,550,530; for 1915, $90,578,970; for 1916, $139,619,827. The total net loss in our favorable trade balance with all South American countries for these three years, as compared with 1913, was $256,749,327. For North and South American countries for these three years there was a grand total net loss in our favorable trade balance of $776,921,365. In these three years there was a net gain in our favorable trade balance with Asia of $18,777,055. But excluding our trade with Russia in Asia, where our exports have been enormously increased by war orders, there has been in these three years a net loss in our favorable trade balance of $132,883,387.

In these three years there has been a net loss in our favorable trade balance with Africa of $16,920,685.

In these three years there has been a net loss in our favorable trade balance with Oceania, as compared with 1913, of $54,996,556.

In these three years there has been a total loss in our favorable trade balances with the countries of North America, South America, Asia, Africa, and Oceania of $830,060,751. Excluding Russia in Asia, the total net loss has been $962,944,138.

These losses in our net favorable trade balance have been growing greater year by year. The loss for 1914 was $186,900,908; for 1915, $329,327,980; and for 1916, $313,822,863. At this rate in four years of Democratic economic policies in our net favorable trade balances with all countries outside of Europe we will lose more than $1,200,000,000.

The statistics heretofore given show that in our trade with non-European countries for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, we did business at an actual loss of $247,155,325. At this rate in four years of Democratic rule we would lose in trade with countries outside of Europe $988,621,300. This means that in four years of trade with non-European countries we will transfer from wealth actually produced in this country—produced by the 12,500,000 toilers on our farms and by the 8,000,000 wage earners in our manufacturing establishments and by the toilers in other fields of labor—from this wealth we will transfer to the inhabitants of other countries the immense sum of one thousand millions of dollars. Under the conditions of trade with these countries under Republican policies in four years we would have transferred from these countries to the permanent wealth of this country $266,000,000. Think of it! Under Republican rule over two hundred millions gained, under Democratic rule a thousand millions lost.

This is not all. There is another line of statistics which illuminate the subject under discussion. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, the last year under the protective-tariff policy, the balance of trade in favor of this country was $652,875,915. In that year in our trade with foreign nations we made an average net profit of over $54,000,000 per month, $13,500,000 per week, and $2,000,000 for every day in the year. Prior thereto for 16 years in succession under Republican rule we did business with foreign nations at an immense profit. Our total foreign trade increased by leaps and bounds. Our favorable trade balance grew from $102,882,264 in 1896 to $652,875,915 in 1913. Going back for a period of 38 years, there were only 3 years when the balance of trade was against us. Two of these years were during Cleveland's first administration and the other was in 1893, partly under his second administration.

For the 16 years under McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft the grand total of the balance of trade in our favor was $8,382,515,026. In these 16 years, in their trade with us, other nations contributed to the permanent wealth of this Nation the stupendous sum of $8,382,515,026.

With this splendid showing under a Republican protective-tariff policy, extending over a period of 39 years, it is almost unbelievable that within a period of 5 months and 12 days this favorable trade balance could have been completely wiped out. But that is what is shown by official statistics of the Department of Commerce, as recorded, tabulated, and published under a Democratic Secretary of Commerce. The Underwood tariff bill became a law October 3, 1913. In the month of April, 1914, the balance of trade against us was $11,345,606; in May the balance against us was $2,456,896; for June it was $653,523; and for July it was $5,003,592. The total balance of trade against us for these four months was $20,014,368.

In 16 years in succession of Republican policies in our foreign trade we had, in round numbers, a net annual profit of $500,000,000. In less than six months under Democratic economic policies we were doing business with foreign nations at an actual loss.

PROTECTION.

The Republican Party in its platform of 1860 enunciated its chief economic policy in the following language:

That while providing revenue for the support of the General Government by duties upon imports, sound policy requires such an adjustment of these imposts as to encourage the development of the industrial interests of the whole country; and we commend that policy of national exchanges which secures to the workingmen liberal wages, to agriculture remunerative prices, to mechanics and manufacturers an adequate reward for their skill, labor, and enterprise, and to the Nation commercial prosperity and independence.

Fifty-six years have come and gone. The keynote sounded in 1860 will echo and reecho in the campaign of 1916. On the tariff question the Republican Party stands where it stood in 1860. Where the founders of our party stood, we stand. Where Lincoln stood in 1860, Charles Evans Hughes stands in 1916. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The protective-tariff policy, as expounded and administered under Republican rule, has been a mighty factor in our material development, in the growth of our industries, in the expansion of our trade and commerce, in the production of our wealth, and in promoting the well-being, the prosperity, the contentment, and happiness of all our people.

In the language of the platform of 1860, the protective-tariff policy has "encouraged the industrial development of the whole country" and secured "to workingmen liberal wages, to agriculture remunerative prices, to mechanics and manufacturers an adequate reward for their skill, labor, and enterprise, and to the Nation commercial prosperity and independence."

For 16 years in succession prior to March 4, 1913, the Republican Party was in power. In all these years it pursued the protective-tariff policy enunciated in the platform of 1860. These were years of growth, of development, of expansion, of enlargement. [Applause on the Republican side.]

There was a growth in both our exports and imports; growth in the balance of trade in our favor; growth in the value of the annual products of our industries; growth in the number of persons employed in gainful occupations, in the amount of wages paid to employees, and in the average daily wage paid to wage earners in all lines of industry; growth in the total amount of money in circulation and in the per capita circulation for each individual; growth in the amount of our bank deposits and in the average amount to the credit of each depositor; growth in the deposits of our savings banks, which represent the surplus earnings of our wage earners and other persons of small means; growth in the mileage of our railroads, in the volume of their business, and in the character of the service rendered the public; growth in the annual revenues of the Government, sufficient to meet the natural and necessary increase of expenditures; growth in the amount of cash in the general fund of the Treasury, adequate in amount to give the United States a credit superior to that of any other nation in the world; growth in the credit power of our financial institutions, sufficient to supply the ever-increasing demands of the business interests of the country; growth in the purchasing power of the American people in ratio with the increased production of our industries; growth in the supply of the necessaries of life found in the average home in the land; growth in the amount of luxuries within the reach of the masses of the people; growth in our educational facilities, in the number of our schools and churches, in the opportunities for self-improvement, culture, and recreation; and as an inevitable consequence, during all these 16 years, there was a constant and ever-increasing growth in the power, in the influence, in the prestige, in the greatness, and in the glory of this Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 23, 1916.

(Legislative day of Monday, August 21, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

GEORGE RUBLEE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has received a communication from the Federal Trade Commission in response to the resolution of the Senate, which the Chair orders printed in the RECORD.

The communication referred to is as follows:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, August 22, 1916.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: In response to Senate resolution 251, adopted August 21, 1916, requesting me to inform the Senate whether, and under what authority, Mr. George Rublee is now acting as a member of the Federal Trade Commission, I have the honor to transmit the following:

The act creating the Federal Trade Commission was approved September 26, 1914. On February 22, 1915, the President nominated Mr. Rublee for membership on the commission. March 4, 1915, the Senate adjourned without having acted upon the nomination. March 5, 1915, the President filled the vacancy by commissioning Mr. Rublee to act as a member of the Trade Commission "until the end of the next session of the Senate of the United States, and no longer."

On December 10, 1915, the President transmitted Mr. Rublee's nomination to the Senate, which, on May 15, 1916, the Senate refused to confirm. Thereafter, on August 1, 1916, Mr. Rublee tendered to the President his resignation in the following letter:

AUGUST 1, 1916.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: When the Senate last May refused to confirm your nomination of me as Federal Trade Commissioner and then the motion to reconsider its action failed my inclination was to resign at once, as I felt that my continuance in office might be misunderstood.

The circumstances, however, were such that it seemed to be my duty to go on until certain work in which my help was needed should be finished.

My colleagues on the commission also urged me strongly to keep on serving, at least until my retirement would not seriously disturb the work of the commission. So I went on.

The situation now has changed. The matters for which I was particularly wanted are either wound up or are in such a condition that my further participation in them is not necessary. My withdrawal from the commission would not affect its work more now than a few weeks later.

For these reasons it seems proper that I should resign, and I hereby tender to you my resignation as Federal Trade Commissioner.

I hope that in accepting it you will agree with me that I am doing the right thing.

I appreciate deeply the confidence in me which you have shown, both by appointing me in the first place and by continuing to support me after the appointment was opposed in the Senate.

Very respectfully, yours,

GEORGE RUBLEE.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

On August 3, 1916, the President expressly requested Mr. Rublee to withhold his resignation and to continue to serve on the commission. His letter follows:

AUGUST 3, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. RUBLEE: It is with the most genuine regret that I receive your letter of August 1, tendering your resignation as Federal Trade Commissioner, and I am going to ask if you will not be generous enough to withhold the resignation for the present, at any rate, and continue to serve on the commission as long as it is possible. I know how highly the commissioners value your counsel and cooperation, and I share, as I hope you know, their high estimate of your work and service. I hope that you will not insist upon the immediate acceptance of your resignation, which I am very loath indeed to accept.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. GEORGE RUBLEE,
The Crossways, Cornish Hills, N. H.

In compliance with the President's request, Mr. Rublee has continued to serve on the commission, meanwhile leaving his resignation in the President's hands, to take effect whenever the President may desire.

For your further information I wish to say that Mr. Rublee has served as a member of the Federal Trade Commission from March 16, 1915, to the present time wholly without compensation. His comprehensive grasp of business conditions, his legal knowledge and sound judgment have been invaluable in the work of organizing and directing the commission's activities. A few days ago he returned to Washington from his vacation at my special request to assist and advise on a very important matter now pending before us. He has devoted himself unstintedly to the best interests of the commission, and I feel that I would fail of my duty if I did not say that in the eyes of his associates on the commission he is respected as an efficient and able public servant.

Mr. Rublee acts as a member of this commission by virtue of his recess appointment made by the President under authority expressly conferred by the last paragraph of section 1, Article II, of the Constitution, which provides:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Under this provision it has been held repeatedly since the beginning of this Government that the President has constitutional authority to issue commissions during the recess of the Senate, notwithstanding the fact that the vacancy filled first happened when the Senate was in session. It was so decided by Mr. Justice Woods, of the United States Supreme Court, sitting on circuit, in the case of In re Farrow and Bigby (4 Woods, 491, 495), and the same conclusion has been reached by Mr. Tracewell, Comptroller of the United States Treasury (14 Comp. Dec., 901, 903) and by the Attorneys General in the following instances among others: Mr. Wirt, 1 Opinions A. G., 631; Mr. Taney, 2 Opinions A. G., 525; Mr. Legare, 3 Opinions A. G., 673; Mr. Mason, 4 Opinions A. G., 523; Mr. Cushing, 7 Opinions A. G., 186; Mr. Bates, 10 Opinions A. G., 356; Mr. Stanbery, 12 Opinions A. G., 32; Mr. Evarts, 12 Opinions A. G., 455; Mr. Williams, 14 Opinions A. G., 562; Mr. Devens, 16 Opinions A. G., 522; Mr. Brewster, 17 Opinions A. G., 521; Mr. Miller, 19 Opinions A. G., 261; Mr. Moody, 25 Opinions A. G., 258; Mr. Hoyt (acting), 26 Opinions A. G., 234; Mr. Gregory, 30 Opinions A. G., 314.

As pointed out by Attorney General Devens (16 Opinions A. G., 531), the act of February 9, 1863 (R. S., sec. 1761), prohibiting the payment of compensation "to any person appointed during the recess of the Senate to fill a vacancy in any existing office, if a vacancy existed while the Senate was in session," until the appointee has been confirmed by the Senate, constitutes a recognition by Congress itself of the power of the President to make such appointments.

Nor is there any difference in the exercise of this constitutional power between cases which originate during the session by the new creation of the office and those which so originate by the termination of a previous incumbency. "The need of the official service in the public interest is presumptively as great in one case as the other, and the executive duty of the President, for the discharge of which this constitutional power is vested in him, is not qualified by the circumstance that the office is to be filled for the first time." (Attorney General Evarts, 12 Opinions A. G., 455, 457; Attorney General Miller, 19 Opinions A. G., 261, 263; Acting Attorney General Hoyt, 26 Opinions A. G., 234, 235; Mr. Tracewell, Comptroller of the Treasury, 14 Comp. Dec., 901, 903.)

A commission issued by the President during a recess of the Senate continues until the end of the next session of the Senate, unless sooner determined by the President, even though the individual commissioner shall have been meanwhile nominated by the President to the office and the nomination rejected. It was so held in the case of In re Marshalship (20 Fed., 379), where the court said (382):

"The authorities on this subject—that is, the nature and duration of a temporary appointment made by the President to fill a vacancy—are that a commission issued by the President during a recess of the Senate continues until the end of the next session of the Senate, unless sooner determined by the President, even though the person commissioned shall have been in the meantime nominated by the President to the office and his nomination rejected."

As early as 1830 the same conclusion was reached by Attorney General Berrien in the case of Isaac Hill (2 Opinions A. G., 336, 337), as follows:

"In the exercise of the power thus conferred upon the President, Mr. Isaac Hill was, during the present session of Congress, nominated by him to the Senate, and the nomination has been rejected by that body. I apprehend that the commission granted to Mr. Hill in the recess remains untouched by this nomination and the rejection of it."

This precedent has been followed by other Attorneys General and acquiesced in by the Senate. (Attorney General Taney, 2 Opinions A. G., 525, 526; Attorney General Legare, 4 Opinions A. G., 30; Attorney General Stanbery, 12 Opinions A. G., 32.)

With regard to the act of May 1, 1884 (23 Stat., 17), prohibiting any officer of the United States from accepting "voluntary service" for the Government, I am advised that if this statute were applicable to recess appointments it would be an unconstitutional attempt to impose a limitation upon the President's power. I am further advised, however, that the words "voluntary service," within the meaning of this statute, do not include services in an established office, which Congress itself has provided may, under certain circumstances, be filled without compensation, but rather services intruded by a private person as a "volunteer." It was so held by Attorney General Wickersham with regard to the act of February 27, 1906 (34 Stat., 48), which is a reenactment ipsis verbis of the act of May 1, 1884. Mr. Wickersham said (30 Opinions A. G., 51):

"It seems plain that the words 'voluntary service' were not intended to be synonymous with 'gratuitous service,' and were not intended to cover services rendered in an official capacity, under regular appointment to an office otherwise permitted by law to be nonsalaried. In their ordinary and normal meaning these words refer to service intruded by a private person as a 'volunteer' and not rendered pursuant to any prior contract or obligation, and they were exactly so construed (though not as a part of this statute) in Board of Commissioners v. Richardson (54 Ind., 153–156.)"

I am advised, therefore, that Mr. Rublee, having been appointed by the President under power expressly given by the Constitution and under circumstances such that Congress itself has provided that the appointee shall serve without compensation, is not a "volunteer" within the meaning of the statute.

Respectfully, EDWARD N. HURLEY, Chairman.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: Mr. President, my attention has been called to a report from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission in response to the resolution I offered a few days ago in reference to Mr. George Rublee. Since entering the Chamber I have hurriedly read the reply and note the argument that has been made by Mr. Hurley, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, that Mr. Rublee is constitutionally performing his duties as a member of that commission, and cites authorities to sustain that view. While I think otherwise, I do not propose this morning to discuss the matter at all. The citations that I gave a few days ago from the statutes, to my mind, cover this case very conclusively.

I notice that Mr. Hurley goes out of his way to pay a tribute to Mr. Rublee, which he was not asked by the resolution to do, but as Mr. Hurley came to the Capitol during the proceedings of the Senate on the Rublee nomination and, as I think, improperly exerted his influence in behalf of Mr. Rublee, it is not remarkable that he should come to the rescue of Mr. Rublee at this time.

I assume that the communication has been ordered printed; and if so, I have nothing further to say about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not read it, but the Chair ordered that it be printed, it being in answer to a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. That course is agreeable to me.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, out of order, I ask leave to report with an amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (H. R. 17498) making aprpropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 816) thereon. I ask that the bill be taken up for consideration at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, with the understanding that it will not take over an hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17498) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in reference to the pending bill, I desire to state to the Senate that the bill as it passed the Senate originally was vetoed by the President because the Articles of War exempted from their provisions the retired officers and enlisted men of the Army. That, as I understand it, was the only objection urged by the President in his veto message.

When the message and the bill went back to the House the bill was reintroduced in the House of Representatives exactly as it passed the House and Senate, eliminating, however, the Articles of War. When it came over to the Senate yesterday it was referred to the Military Affairs Committee and the committee now report the bill back to the Senate exactly as it heretofore passed Congress, inserting in the House bill the Articles of War, including within their terms the retired officers and enlisted men of the Army.

I am advised that if the bill goes to the House of Representatives in this form the amendment will now be concurred in, and I am very much in hopes that it may be passed by the Senate and go back to the House without any other change. In its present form it is exactly as it passed Congress the first time, with a few grammatical changes only.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, there was attached to the Army appropriation bill an amendment known as No. 52, which purported to retire with the rank of lieutenant colonel of Cavalry in the Army Gen. Edward W. Whitaker, late lieutenant colonel of the First Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Cavalry. That matter had passed the Senate as an independent bill. Everybody agrees as to its merits. Gen. Whitaker was an officer of most distinguished gallantry. His record is phenomenal in that respect and has been placed at length in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Owing to the situation in the House there is little prospect that the bill the Senate passed will be passed by the House as an independent measure at this time, there being no quorum in the House. I ask the Senator from Oregon if he can not let that amendment go on the bill and let it go to conference?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have been in conference with the chirman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House this morning and the bill as it is prepared now, I am sure, will not meet any opposition in the House of Representatives.

In reference to Gen. Whitaker, while the committee recognized his services and his ability as a Volunteer Army officer, the others who were included in the bill were Regular officers and Gen. Whitaker was the only Volunteer officer whose name was proposed for promotion. There is a bill which has already been passed by the Senate for his relief and it is now pending before the committee of the House. The committee thought that the House would take that bill up and dispose of it. For that reason, amongst others, it was not included in the bill here.

I would rather not have the bill amended if the Senate can see fit to consider it as it is, because I am sure that it would very much hasten its final passage if no amendment were made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This matter has been before Congress for the last 20 years. Gen. Whitaker has session after session, ever since I have been here, labored until this session in vain to get his magnificent war record from the War Department.

It was not until this session that he was able to get it from the department and Congress had to pass a resolution ordering the department to send it here. The minute the record was seen the Committee on Military Affairs agreed unanimously that the case was an extraordinary one and hastened to do justice to this old general who is now ill and in his declining years.

The amendment went on the bill with a unanimous report from the committee. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] told me that he had never seen such a magnificent military record of one of that rank, and he could not understand why this simple act of recognition had been deferred so long. The Senate unanimously placed it upon the bill.

It is about the last chance this old gentleman has to be retired with the very modest rank of lieutenant colonel. His services to his country in the hour of need were magnificent, and he has letters, indorsements, and appreciations from the highest officers in the Army. His record is without a stain or flaw, and this old man is to-day utterly unrecognized and in need.

Of course I have no desire to embarrass the passage of the Army appropriation bill, but I do not think it will embarrass it. Since the appropriation bill was agreed to in conference without this amendment, the Senate conferees being persuaded to recede by some of the House Members, every effort has been made to get the House to pass the bill as an independent measure. Senators must know that the House being in the situation in which it is now, with no quorum, it is impossible for this man to get what is really due to him from the Government. I appeal to the Senator from Oregon to let it go to conference once more, and if he finds that it is at all imperiling the passage of the bill he need not insist any further than his good judgment dictates that he should. He can recede at any time.

Mr. President, I feel compelled to offer this as an amendment to the bill now reported from the committee. I would rather have the Senator agree to let it go to conference as the Senate has passed it already.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state that I do not believe the bill will go to conference in its present form. I am inclined to believe from advices I have received that the Senate amendment will be concurred in and that there will be no difficulty about the passage of the bill now in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is not the Senator willing to give the House a chance to concur in the amendment again?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We had a serious controversy in the last conference over this one item. I understood that the independent bill was going to be favorably reported to the House and taken up in the House. I do not believe we could retain it in the bill even if the bill went to conference with the amendment. That is my judgment about it after the experience we had in the last conference on the subject.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President, of course I realize that if the chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee feels in that way about it, it would be no use to ask that the matter go to conference, because without his active advocacy of it in conference it would be stricken out. So I shall have to content myself at this time, Mr. President, with simply saying that in the future I shall offer this amendment to every appropriate bill. I hope, if not at this Congress, that at the next Congress justice may be done to this officer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Connecticut has presented an amendment? Is there an amendment pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I refrained from offering the amendment after the expressions of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to be inserted at the proper place in the Articles of War, which, as I understand, are embraced in this bill, to read as follows:

That no person under the age of 21 years shall be enlisted or mustered into the military service of the United States without the written consent of his parents or guardians: Provided, however, That such minor has such parents or guardians entitled to his custody and control; and this proviso shall be applicable to all minors enlisted or mustered into the military service of the United States on and after June 3, 1916.

Mr. President, since shortly after the days of the Civil War the law has been on the statute books that no man under the age of 21 could be lawfully enlisted in the military forces of the United States, which included the Regular Establishment as well as the National Guard, without the consent of his parents or guardian. When the bill known as the Army reorganization bill was before the two Houses that provision of law was not changed. Subsequently, when the bill went to conference, the conferees changed the lawful age of enlistment from 21 years to 18 years without the matter being brought before the two Houses, except in so far as the conference report itself brought it before the Houses of Congress. In other words, the age of enlistment for men in the military service of the United States was changed in conference and not by the two Houses of Congress. Under ordinary circumstances I would not attempt in any way to delay the passage of this bill, but the House of Representatives has never taken a direct vote on this question. When the military appropriation bill was before the Senate some days ago the Senate by more than a two-thirds majority—by practically a three-fourths majority—inserted an amendment changing the age of enlistment back to 21 years.

Mr. President, this proposition in regard to enlistment is a vital one. It is a question that affects the homes throughout the States of this country. It is a radical change in our military law. In view of the vote of the Senate restoring the age of 21 a few days ago, a mere formal disagreement in the House of Representatives to all the Senate amendments, and its rejection again by the conferees on the part of the two Houses, notwithstanding the overwhelming vote of the Senate on this subject, I feel that this proposition should again go back to the House of Representatives and that the conferees on the part of the Senate should demand a vote on the question directly in the House of Representatives before the provision is excluded from the bill.

I do not care to go into a lengthy discussion of this question at this time, Mr. President, or to delay the Senate in the consideration of the bill, but I feel that it is a vital question. In time of war the country would probably call on boys 18 years of age to follow the flag. It has called on boys of much younger age to do so in the past, and no one could question the right, in case of necessity, for the Government to do so; but we are in a condition of profound peace; even the war clouds that hovered a few weeks ago on the Mexican border are passing away. The probabilities are that there will decades roll by before this Government is again involved in actual warfare; and yet, under the terms of the law that is enacted in the Army reorganization bill, a recruiting sergeant can go to any country town in this country and persuade an 18-year-old boy that it is his duty to his country to enlist; that there is glory in his following a military life. That boy may be a mere child. You propose to allow that recruiting sergeant to drag that boy away from his home and his family, without the consent of his father or his mother, and when you have placed the manacles of the military power of the United States about his wrists that home is broken up; there is no relief. When the father and the mother write you and ask you to secure redress and to secure the discharge of that boy, who was enlisted without their consent, from military service in the United States Army, the answer you will send back will be that the law of the country has been changed; that the legal age of enlistment in the military service of the United States has been made 18 years. But it will have been made 18 years by your consent and without your protest. If it were necessary, no one would agree to the proposition more cheerfully than would I; but I know it is not necessary, and you know it is not necessary.

I understand where this proposition comes from, and it is very natural that it should come from that source. If the military men of our Government were not imbued with the idea in their own minds that military service is of more importance to this country than is any other service or than is any other life, they would probably not be possessed of those characteristics essential to make them great generals on the firing line, and which would enable them to sacrifice thousands and hundreds of thousands of their fellow citizens in order to carry their point at the cannon's mouth. But this country is not yet governed by the military men of the Army nor controlled by the military sentiment which they would seek to inculcate in the minds of the people throughout the United States. This country has been governed, except in times of actual war, by the civilian and the civilian sentiment. It has recognized that the right of the home is greater than the right of the military forces of this Republic, and that right of the home guarantees to the fathers and the mothers of this country that they shall say whether the boys of this land shall engage in a military life before the age of 21 or whether they shall not.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that boys under 21 years of age when they enlist in the Army are still infants in the eye of the law, and are held incapable of even making a contract. I heartily agree with the position the Senator has taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They were infants in the eyes of the law and incapable of making a contract until the Committees on Military Affairs gave them the right to make this contract of enlistment. That is what I am complaining of. Until the Military Committees of the two Houses gave these boys the right to make this contract they were prohibited by law from doing so. I recognize that there are some boys who are grown men when they are 18 years of age. They have faced the reponsibilities of life; they are able to take care of themselves; they are able to mold their own futures; but there are many boys at 18 years of age who are children. They do not know what vocation in life they want to follow; they do not know what is best for them; they do not know how to plan their lives. If you throw a boy of that kind into the Army, place him in association with men who have been drawn from the great cities, men whose lives are not Christian lives, whose bringing up is not that of the country boy with his surroundings, you are apt to destroy a young life instead of making one.

I recognize the fact that this great military machine of ours will, in answer, say that 18 years is the age when some of the great nations of Europe summon a boy to the colors; that 18 years is the age when the boy is most susceptible to military training; and that if he is enlisted in the army at 18 years of age, when he reaches 21 he will have had three years of active service and will be a trained soldier who can be held in reserve until the age of 25, between 21 and 25 being the best ages for reserves. Well, if we had determined to be a military Nation, if we had determined by our legislation that the most important question confronting the American people is the beating drum, the blare of the bugle, and the screech of the shrapnel, or, in other words, the defense of our country against enemies who are not threatening us, we might listen to the appeals of these military geniuses; but if we should listen to them, the logical conclusion to which we would come and to which they desire us to come would be compulsory military enlistment throughout the United States. They would have us say that every boy 18 years of age must serve in the military forces of the United States for three years actively and four years in the reserves. If we intended to adopt such a policy, and it met with the approval of the popular sentiment of the country, then it might be wise to say that every boy 18 years of age must commence service in the Army; but we have not adopted that policy, and we will not adopt that policy in either branch of the Congress of the United States, because if we try to do so the result will be vacant seats at the end of the next election.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator knows, of course, that the age prescribed for enlistments in the Army corresponds with the age in the Navy. Has the Senator ever raised a voice against the admittance into the Navy of boys of the age of 18?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I have not, because the question as to the age of enlistment of boys in the Navy had been determined by the statutes of the United States before I had any hand in framing legislation.

Mr. WARREN. But, on the other hand, with the Senator's keen sense of right and justice and his experience in legislation, without doubt he would have raised his voice heretofore if complaints had reached him as to the ill effects in the Navy of such enlistments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will say to the Senator that I have had complaints, and sometimes serious complaints, arising from the enlistment of boys from my State in the Navy; but they have not been as serious as the complaints which have arisen in connection with the enlistment of boys of 18 in the Army. I have not the opportunity to-day to endeavor to repeal the law in reference to the Navy. I would if I could, but I can not. I know, however, from past experience that boys have run away from home in my State, made false affidavits in reference to their age, and they have caused their fathers and their mothers much suffering and much heartburning to get them out of the service.

There is no necessity for this provision. It was not the law; it has not been the law of the land. There is no demand from the American people that it should be the law. It comes here vouched for solely by the military machine. So far as my vote is concerned, when the provision is not necessary, I am not going to surrender my constituency or the homes of the people whom I represent to a military machine to have unbridled power to determine the fate of the young men of my country who are under 21 years of age. Enlist some of them in the Army, and they may make a great success of it. Carry some to the Army, and it means their eternal ruin.

Now, this provision was not put in the bill by the consent of the Senate or by the consent of the House of Representatives. It was put in this bill by the conferees; and I am not going to sit quiet and consent to its remaining in the bill until the Senate, by a majority vote, votes me down on the question, and then I shall have to consent.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I have sought recognition from the Chair ever since the first amendment was propounded to the Senate, and wish to reserve the right, if that seems desirable, to make objection to it as general legislation.

The amendment just offered by the Senator from Alabama illustrates the viciousness of including fundamental changes of law in these great supply bills. This supply bill has been tied up here for a long time, not because of differences of opinion on the elements of supplies—quite the contrary—and this bill has been vetoed once by the President, not because he objected to any provision for supply but on account of proposed general legislation, the revision of the Articles of War of the United States, which have been unrevised for nearly a hundred years, and could be revised at any time. That has been already the cause for setting aside once this large appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I will not make the point of order. I hope the Senate of itself will see the advisability of absolutely limiting these provisions of a general nature, whenever they are made, to provisions of such a character as will pass both the Houses of Congress without objection. I understand, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr CHAMBERLAIN] has just said, that these Articles of War, as changed, are practically now agreed upon by the representatives of both bodies; and though these changes, as I have said, have been neglected for a hundred years, and the Army is not suffering for the lack of them, yet so far, so good; let that matter pass.

But now comes the Senator from Alabama with an entirely new proposition, a proposition that was heretofore resisted by the House conferees. He wants to add that to the impediments in the way of this great supply bill. In effect, while pleading the rights of the family and of some one child whose absence he alleges destroys the home, he wishes to disintegrate and demoralize, so far as his proposition would apply, the forces of the United States now assembled on the frontier of a foreign country.

I wish I could agree with the Senator from Alabama that we are in a condition of profound peace. I wish I thought about it as he seems to think about it; but we have 110,000 National Guardsmen on the Rio Grande to-day, with the addition of Regular United States forces, whatever their numbers may be, and also 40,000 other guardsmen assembled in camps under the President's call. Clashes of various kinds on the Rio Grande are not unusual, and the internal conditions of Mexico are perhaps the same to-day that they have been for the last two or three years. The condition is more imminent than it has ever yet been, so far as assembled men in arms is concerned, and yet the Senator from Alabama chooses to close his eyes to this great general condition and proposes a demoralization of these forces of the United States by directing the withdrawal of men lawfully enlisted, a retroactive amendment to the Articles of War—an amendment that will go back and turn out of the service men who have been heretofore lawfully enlisted in the service. The time to have objected was when the change was proposed.

I sympathize to some extent with the Senator's criticism of rather undue liberties taken with the feature of the military law by the conference committee in the changing of so fundamental a proposition as the age for enlistment, and, generally speaking, it might be well to raise for the future the limit from 18 years to 19 years.

Mr. President, I have no objection to a change applying to the future, preventing young men under 19 years from being enlisted for the future, but I can not agree with the Senator's general statement that a home is endangered when a hard-headed boy goes off and enlists without the consent of his parents. I took the position before, and I take it now, that this kind of a boy gets a great deal of good out of military discipline, and that about the only hope for such a boy is for him to enlist and get real discipline before his overindulgent and probably weak parents have utterly ruined him for the rest of his life.

Mr. President, I shall not make the point of order suggested, but simply call the attention of the Senate to the advisability of acting, without introducing further general questions, upon this great supply bill, which provides, among other items, $6,000,000 for machine guns for the Regular Army of the United States and $6,000,000 for machine guns for the National Guard of the United States. Do you want to stop that supply? Do you want to have these forces of ours on the Rio Grande stay there, as they are to-day, less well equipped than are the soldiers of other nations? That is the real proposition the Senator from Alabama is up against. This money should be promptly available to equip the troops of the United States at least equally with the troops of other nations, and the sentimentality developed over one or two individual cases should not interfere longer with the whole military progress and equipment of the soldiers of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I can not impress upon the Senate too strongly the urgency of this general appropriation bill. A general resolution passed Congress providing for continuing appropriations for emergencies until the regular appropriation bills could be acted upon; but that resolution does not cover pay and other appropriations for the National Guard not in the service of the United States. There has been no appropriation made in the past, as the Senator from Maryland very well remembers, that would cover certain conditions affecting the National Guard not in the service of the United States; so that until this bill can become a law there is no provision for the pay of such National Guardsmen. In addition to that, Mr. President, there is no provision under existing law for relief to the dependent families of the National Guardsmen, and this bill provides the money necessary for that purpose.

I greatly fear that to undertake to amend the bill now will imperil its passage in the House of Representatives, and I think if it is not changed it will pass without any question.

Mr. President, with reference to the age limit for enlistment, the Senator from Alabama seems to forget that under the law as it affects the National Guard now in the country they can be enlisted between 18 and 21 without the consent of the parents. Assuming that the National Guardsmen are enlisted under the State laws in the National Guard, and it becomes necessary to draft them into the service of the United States, all of those boys who have enlisted in the National Guard, if this amendment of the Senator is adopted, will naturally be exempted from the draft. It was largely to make the Federal statute with reference to the age limits for enlistment in the Regular Army and the State laws with reference to enlistment in the National Guard conform to each other that this change was made.

The whole question was up in conference here when this bill was up before. The Senate added the La Follette amendment, which is the one the Senator proposes now, to the Army appropriation bill; and when it got into conference we held out for it as long as we deemed it possible to hold out, in the hope that we might have that amendment, as then proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin and as now proposed by the Senator from Alabama, remain in the bill. But it went out; and now, Mr. President, I have no reason to believe, from the position that was taken by the House conferees at that time, that any change has taken place in the feeling of the House with regard to this amendment. It will disorganize the Army and disarrange the attempt made by Congress to conform the Regular Army to the National Guard as proposed by the Senator, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, what the Senator says about the National Guard is one of the good reasons why this amendment should be agreed to. For a boy to enlist in the National Guard in his home town, where he sleeps every night in his own bed at home, where his only service is within the borders of his State, where his own people come in contact with him, and if he is ordered out for service it is only for a few weeks, and it does not interfere with the channel of his life, is a very different thing from taking him out and making him a part of the military service of the United States for three years.

Now, mark you, here is the wrong of this question; here is the deceit of this legislation: When these young men back in your State and in my State enlisted in the National Guard at 18 years of age the law of your country provided that they could not serve in the military service of the United States under 21 years of age, and if they had been mustered in at that time their parents would have had a right to stop them. But the President orders the National Guard to the Mexican line and then a conference committee—not the Congress—takes upon itself the responsibility of changing the contract that those boys had made with their parents' consent, and when they reach the border they find that if they made a contract at 18 years of age they have to stand by it under changed conditions.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to a statement he made that is not quite in accordance with the facts? I know the Senator does not intend to make a statement that is not correct. Under the Dick bill the minimum age of enlistment was 18. Boys could enlist between 18 and 21 without the consent of the parents or the guardian.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; but——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That bill and the amendments thereof authorized the calling forth of the National Guard into the service either within or without the territory of the United States. Of course, the provision with reference to the use of the militia outside the United States was subsequently held to be unconstitutional by the Attorney General and the Judge Advocate General of the Army. Still, those who enlisted under the Dick law of 1903 and the amendatory act of May 27, 1908, have not had any contract of enlistment changed as to them, because the provision in the national defense act of June 3, 1916, with reference to the minimum age is really a confirmation of the Dick law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is talking in the index and not in reference to facts. He himself stated a moment ago that the conferees changed this provision in the law so they could hold in the National Guard these young men under 21 years of age.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but that was in view of an opinion of the Attorney General of the United States that under the Dick law they could not be sent outside of the limits of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, certainly; and the decision that under the Dick law they could not be carried out of the State was made so long ago that there is not a boy in the National Guard this year who did not enlist since the decision was made that under the Dick law he could not be ordered out of his State without a further enlistment. The Senator knows that as well as I do. Therefore his argument is merely sounding in the index of the proposition, and not going to the substance of the proposition that is before the Senate.

The argument is made that we must not delay this bill; that the necessity for guns and cannon at the front is so great that we can not delay the passage of the bill for 24 hours or 48 hours for the sake of humanity, for the sake of the homes of this country. The President of the United States did not think the necessity for the construction of cannon and the making of shells was so great and the necessity for the immediate enactment into law of this bill was so great that when he found in it an error relating to some retired Army officers he did not feel justified in vetoing the bill and delaying its passage. And what is the question of the status of a few retired Army officers compared with the boys and the homes of this country?

Why, the committee itself answered the Senator's own argument.

This bill was due for passage to make appropriations for the fiscal year commencing the 1st day of July next. To-day is the 23d day of August. The Senate committee did not think it was so necessary to rush this appropriation bill through to final passage that it should even begin at the date when the appropriations should have become available—at the beginning of the fiscal year. I know the reason why they did not, and I am not criticizing them because they did not pass it before the 1st day of July; but I say it is a very lame argument to come here and say that this bill can not wait 24 or 48 hours until the House of Representatives has a chance to vote on this proposition, when the committee itself has delayed the passage of the bill for nearly two months.

Mr. President, there is no reason in the world why this bill will not be just as effective if it becomes a law next week as it will if it passes to-day and is signed to-morrow. It will not expedite the purchase of a single cannon or the firing of a single shell to send this bill to the President to-day instead of sending it to him at the end of the week, after the House of Representatives has voted on the question. I am not complaining about the action of my colleagues if they act. I say, however, that a three-fourths majority of the Senate, at the only time it has ever had a chance to pass on this proposition, said that in time of profound peace these boys should not be enlisted under 21 years of age.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if I am wrong, the Senator will correct me; but I do not take it for granted that the item was put in originally in conference in the bill which was passed and approved July 3. I think it was put in in the regular way by the Senate on a House bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Which amendment is the Senator talking about?

Mr. WARREN. I am talking about the change of law that permits the enlistment of boys 18 years of age and over without the consent of their parents.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will be very glad if the Senator will show me that that is the fact, because I understand the fact to be absolutely to the contrary. That is my understanding of the situation, and I have not heard it contradicted up to this time.

Mr. WARREN. Well, I will state it as a fact, from my remembrance, and leave it for the Senator to correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I will challenge the Senator from Wyoming to put in the RECORD the provision of the bill as it passed the Senate that contained this change of status in the Army.

I was informed, as a matter of fact the Senator from Wisconsin announced on the 21st day of July, when this matter was pending in the Senate before, that this question was put in in conference. The Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, did not deny the proposition when it was asserted, and has not denied up to this hour that this provision was put in in conference and in neither of the Houses, and the Senator from Oregon is sitting within the sound of my voice now.

Mr. President, I do not want to delay the Senate. I am not opposed to a reasonable Military Establishment in the United States. I am not criticizing the Army officers of the United States for being ultramilitary in their manner and their mode of living and in their thoughts of life, but I say that that may be justified in them because it is their profession. But it is not justifiable in the Senate of the United States; it is not a justifiable position for a man who represents the great civic forum of the United States, the very life and heartbeat of this country.

Mr. NELSON obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NELSON. For what purpose?

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that I would yield to the Senator from Oregon for one hour, but I think, since this matter is up, it would be just as well to finish it, taking as long as may be necessary to pass the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am utterly surprised at the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. He places his opposition to the enlistment of soldiers upon high humanitarian grounds. The theory involved is that it is something disreputable; that it is something out of the ordinary run to have a young man go into the Army of the United States when he is 18 years old; that it is taking him out of civil employment, and so forth.

To my mind, and I speak from experience, the best school a young man of 18 years can enter is the Army, where he must conform to the discipline and regulations there enforced. I enlisted in the Army of the United States as a private soldier at 18 years of age and served through a large period of the Civil War. I have always regarded that as the best part of my education and my best schooling in life.

I would never have gotten along as well as I have had it not been for the teaching, the experience, and the discipline I received in the Army of the United States. What better school is there for a young man 18 years of age than to enter the Army of the United States and for two or three years to subject himself to the training and discipline which the Army affords?

It is belittling the Army of the United States to say that it is a mistake to put young men 18 years of age in the Army. I hold that the Army of the United States is as reputable a body as any that can be found within the broad confines of the Republic. It is as good a place to put our young men, under the charge of skilled and competent officers, as any other of which I have knowledge; and, Mr. President, service in that Army is as honorable as is even service in the Senate of the United States.

What is more, Mr. President, our experience during the Civil War demonstrated beyond a doubt that the best soldiers we had, the men who could stand more marching and endure more hardships than any other class of men, were the boys between 17 and 21. The older ones, those who had been taken from pampered homes and removed from their parents, who would not consent to have their dear children shoulder a musket, were the ones who flunked on the march, on the battle field, in the camp, and in the bivouac.

The sentiment expressed by the Senator from Alabama is belittling to the youth of this country. The young men of this country are not possessed of such a feeble spirit, they are not afflicted with such a species of infantile paralysis, if I may use the expression, as to be afraid to render service to their country or to believe that it would be wrong for them to enter the ranks of the Army before they have arrived at the age of 21.

Bless your soul, a good many people enter into matrimony before they are 21 and make a success of it; and I do not know why, in the case of a young man who is healthy and vigorous, it can be said to be a disgrace to him or that it would be improper to permit young men to join the Army at 18 years of age. If I had a son 18 years of age, I would be very glad to have him supplement his education and training by going into the Regular Army and learning the discipline and training that soldiers get there.

It makes me sick and tired, Mr. President, as an old soldier of the Civil War to hear all the maudlin sentiment that I have heard in these recent days. We had a militia company in our State of university boys who had been parading and soldiering around the university campus for months and months. They were brave fellows, no doubt, but when they were about to be mustered into the United States Army to go to the Mexican border, some of their dear parents, inspired, I think, to some extent by the boys, begged that they might not be obliged to go; that it would interfere with their education; and they sent appealing letters to me that it would break the university course or the college course of those boys. What do you think, Mr. President, I wrote to those people? I said the break in their college course would be to their greatest advantage; that if they could get three or four months' training in the Army, it would be worth more to them than all the football and all the baseball they could get on the college campus.

We hear talk about our boys not being fit to go in the Army at 18 years of age, and it is said that it is a shame to keep them out of their work. What better and nobler work is there than to be a soldier in the Army of the United States and to endure that discipline to which I have referred? Whenever I see one of these boys dressed in a khaki uniform parading the streets I feel like taking off my hat to him. I would much sooner take my hat off to him than I would to a fourth or fifth rate politician; and I tell these boys in the purlieus who are outside here to keep bad people out, but if they ever see a man wearing Uncle Sam's uniform, whether a soldier or a sailor, to let him in, and charge it to Senator NELSON.

The idea that a boy is too tender or that it would mar his future prospects to go into the Army before he is 21, it seems to me, is the most preposterous idea in the world; and I trust that no such provision will ever be ingrafted in this bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is usually fair, but it seems to me that he has not only unjustly criticized the War Department and the Army, that in this instance is entirely free from criticism, but he has also unjustly criticized the committees of the House and Senate who have had this bill in charge. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, neither the War Department nor any Army officer has ever recommended any change in the term of enlistment, so far as I know. The change was made largely to give the law on the subject the order and method of a code.

The proposition of the enlistment of boys is not any new thing. In the Navy they are enlisted for service between the ages of 18 and 21 without the consent of their parents or guardians, and the law has been found beneficial. They are enlisted now in the National Guard between the ages of 18 and 21. Large appropriations are made by the appropriation bills to meet the requirements of the act of June 3, 1916, for the training of young men to fit them for service before they are 21, at the ages the Senator now condemns.

But I am not going to say anything more about that, Mr. President. The Senator treats the committee a little bit unfairly when he talks about our urging this bill through in order that cannon may be furnished for the border, that shot and shell may be sent down there for use by the United States troops. I base my support of the bill on no such ground as that, Mr. President. I have stated that the bill provides for the pay of the very young men whom the Senator is now undertaking to care for. It also provides for the pay of the National Guard; it provides for the dependent families of those who are over 21, if you please, who have gone to the front. The matter of guns and ammunition is a matter that could be very safely postponed. But the Senator is doubtless receiving letters from guardsmen now complaining that they have not received their pay since they went into the service of the United States.

With respect to the criticism of the committee, the Senator says that the committee ought to have got to work before the 1st of July and made these appropriations. I venture to say there never was a committee that acted with greater promptness on an appropriation bill than this committee did. The bill was referred to the committee on the 28th day of June. It was reported to the Senate July 3. The committee worked all the intervening time on the bill, a bill embracing over $300,000,000 of appropriations. So it was in committee less than a week. It was considered from July 21 to July 27. It passed the Senate July 27 and was sent to conference July 29. The conference report was made to the Senate August 7 and agreed to in the Senate August 8, and agreed to in the House August 9.

Mr. President, between July 3 and July 21, when the Senate took up the bill for consideration, the delay was not due to the committee. The delay was due to the fact that two great appropriation bills were pending which had the right of way in the Senate. One of them was the naval appropriation bill and the other was the Agricultural appropriation bill. So there was absolutely no delay in reporting the bill to the Senate, and there ought not to be any further delay now; but Senators seem disposed to impose delay by undertaking to put amendments on in which the House conferees absolutely refuse to concur. I refer particularly to the amendment in reference to the enlistment period.

For the reasons I have stated, however strong the arguments made and however sentimental the ground in favor of the amendment suggested by the Senator, I hope the Senate will vote it down and let the bill pass the Senate as it has come from the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are we to proceed upon the theory that the bill is as in Committee of the Whole and that its formal reading has been dispensed with?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the formal reading be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, that will be done, on the statement of the Senator from Oregon. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. The Senator from Alabama will send his amendment to the desk.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama if this is the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] when the bill was up before and which the Senate voted to suspend its rules in order to make it in order on the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is, so much of it as relates to the age of enlistment. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and therefore withhold my vote.

Refusal to appear or testify: Every person not subject to military law who, being duly subpœnaed to appear as a witness before any military court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, or before any officer, military or civil, designated to take a deposition to be read in evidence before such court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, willfully neglects or refuses to appear, or refuses to qualify as a witness, or to testify, or produce documentary evidence which such person may have been legally subpœnaed to produce, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, for which such person shall be punished on information in the district court of the United States or in a court of original criminal jurisdiction in any of the territorial possessions of the United States, jurisdiction being hereby conferred upon such courts for such purpose; and it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney or the officer prosecuting for the Government in any such court of original criminal jurisdiction, on the certification of the facts to him by the military court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, to file an information against and prosecute the person so offending, and the punishment of such person, on conviction, shall be a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment not to exceed six months, or both, at the discretion of the court: Provided, That the fees of such witness and his mileage, at the rates allowed to witnesses attending the courts of the United States, shall be duly paid or tendered said witness, such amounts to be paid out of the appropriation for the compensation of witnesses.

"ART. 24. Compulsory self-incrimination prohibited: No witness before a military court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, or before any officer, military or civil, designated to take a deposition to be read in evidence before a military court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, shall be compelled to incriminate himself or to answer any questions which may tend to incriminate or degrade him.

"ART. 25. Depositions—When admissible: A duly authenticated deposition taken upon reasonable notice to the opposite party may be read in evidence before any military court or commission in any case not capital, or in any proceeding before a court of inquiry or a military board, if such deposition be taken when the witness resides, is found, or is about to go beyond the State, Territory, or District in which the court, commission, or board is ordered to sit, or beyond the distance of 100 miles from the place of trial or hearing, or when it appears to the satisfaction of the court, commission, board, or appointing authority that the witness, by reason of age, sickness, bodily infirmity, imprisonment, or other reasonable cause, is unable to appear and testify in person at the place of trial or hearing: Provided, That testimony by deposition may be adduced for the defense in capital cases.

"ART. 26. "Who, for the purpose of obtaining, or aiding others to obtain, the approval, allowance, or payment of any claim against the United States or any officer thereof, makes, or procures, or advises the making of, any oath to any fact or to any writing or other paper knowing such oath to be false; or

"Who, for the purpose of obtaining, or aiding others to obtain, the approval, allowance, or payment of any claim against the United States or any officer thereof, forges or counterfeits, or procures, or advises the forging or counterfeiting or any signature upon any writing or other paper, or uses, or procures, or advises the use of any such signature, knowing the same to be forged or counterfeited; or

"Who, having charge, possession, custody, or control of any money or other property of the United States, furnished or intended for the military service thereof, knowingly delivers, or causes to be delivered, to any person having authority to receive the same, any amount thereof less than that for which he receives a certificate or receipt; or

"Who, being authorized to make or deliver any paper certifying the receipt of any property of the United States furnished or intended for the military service thereof, makes or delivers to any person such writing, without having full knowledge of the truth of the statements therein contained and with intent to defraud the United States; or

"Who steals, embezzles, knowingly and willfully misappropriates, applies to his own use or benefit, or wrongfully or knowingly sells or disposes of any ordnance, arms, equipments, ammunition, clothing, subsistence stores, money, or other property of the United States furnished or intended for the military service thereof; or

"Who knowingly purchases or receives in pledge for any obligation or indebtedness from any soldier, officer, or other person who is a part of or employed in said forces or service, any ordnance, arms, equipment, ammunition, clothing, subsistence stores, or other property of the United States, such soldier, officer, or other person not having lawful right to sell or pledge the same;

"Shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine or imprisonment, or by such other punishment as a court-martial may adjudge, or by any or all of said penalties. And if any person, being guilty of any of the offenses aforesaid while in the military service of the United States, receives his discharge or is dismissed from the service, he shall continue to be liable to be arrested and held for trial and sentence by a court-martial in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had not received such discharge nor been dismissed.

"ART. 95. Conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman: Any officer or cadet who is convicted of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman shall be dismissed from the service.

"ART. 96. General article: Though not mentioned in these articles, all disorders and neglects to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, all conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the military service, and all crimes or offenses not capital, of which persons subject to military law may be guilty, shall be taken cognizance of by a general or special or summary court-martial, according to the nature and degree of the offense, and punished at the discretion of such court.

"IV. COURTS OF INQUIRY.

"ART. 97. When and by whom ordered: A court of inquiry to examine into the nature of any transaction of or accusation or imputation against any officer or soldier may be ordered by the President or by any commanding officer; but a court of inquiry shall not be ordered by any commanding officer except upon the request of the officer or soldier whose conduct is to be inquired into.

"ART. 98. Composition: A court of inquiry shall consist of three or more officers. For each court of inquiry the authority appointing the court shall appoint a recorder.

"ART. 99. Challenges: Members of a court of inquiry may be challenged by the party whose conduct is to be inquired into, but only for cause stated to the court. The court shall determine the relevancy and validity of any challenge, and shall not receive a challenge to more than one member at a time. The party whose conduct is being inquired into shall have the right to be represented before the court by counsel of his own selection, if such counsel be reasonably available.

"ART. 100. Oath of members and recorder: The recorder of a court of inquiry shall administer to the members the following oath: 'You, A. B., do swear (or affirm) that you will well and truly examine and inquire, according to the evidence, into the matter now before you, without partiality, favor, affection, prejudice, or hope of reward. So help you, God.' After which the president of the court shall administer to the recorder the following oath: 'You, A. B., do swear (or affirm) that you will, according to your best abilities, accurately and impartially record the proceedings of the court and the evidence to be given in the case in hearing. So help you, God.'

"In case of affirmation the closing sentence of adjuration will be omitted.

"ART. 101. Powers; procedure: A court of inquiry and the recorder thereof shall have the same power to summon and examine witnesses as is given to courts-martial and the judge advocate thereof. Such witnesses shall take the same oath or affirmation that is taken by witnesses before courts-martial. A reporter or an interpreter for a court of inquiry shall, before entering upon his duties, take the oath or affirmation required of a reporter or an interpreter for a court-martial. The party whose conduct is being inquired into or his counsel, if any, shall be permitted to examine and cross-examine witnesses so as fully to investigate the circumstances in question.

"ART. 102. Opinion on merits of case: A court of inquiry shall not give an opinion on the merits of the case inquired into unless specially ordered to do so.

"ART. 103. Record of proceedings—How authenticated: Each court of inquiry shall keep a record of its proceedings, which shall be authenticated by the signature of the president and the recorder thereof, and be forwarded to the convening authority. In case the record can not be authenticated by the recorder, by reason of his death, disability, or absence, it shall be signed by the president and by one other member of the court.

"V. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

"ART. 104. Disciplinary powers of commanding officers: Under such regulations as the President may prescribe, and which he may from time to time revoke, alter, or add to, the commanding officer of any detachment, company, or higher command may, for minor offenses not denied by the accused, impose disciplinary punishments upon persons of his command without the intervention of a court-martial, unless the accused demands trial by court-martial.

"The disciplinary punishments authorized by this article may include admonition, reprimand, withholding of privileges, extra fatigue, and restriction to certain specified limits, but shall not include forfeiture of pay or confinement under guard. A person punished under authority of this article who deems his punishment unjust or disproportionate to the offense may, through the proper channel, appeal to the next superior authority, but may in the meantime be required to undergo the punishment adjudged. The commanding officer who imposes the punishment, his successor in command, and superior authority shall have power to mitigate or remit any unexecuted portion of the punishment. The imposition and enforcement of disciplinary punishment under authority of this article for any act or omission shall not be a bar to trial by court-martial for a crime or offense growing out of the same act or omission; but the fact that a disciplinary punishment has been enforced may be shown by the accused upon trial, and when so shown shall be considered in determining the measure of punishment to be adjudged in the event of a finding of guilty.

"ART. 105. Injuries to person or property—Redress of: Whenever complaint is made to any commanding officer that damage has been done to the property of any person or that his property has been wrongfully taken by persons subject to military law, such complaint shall be investigated by a board consisting of any number of officers from one to three, which board shall be convened by the commanding officer and shall have, for the purpose of such investigation, power to summon witnesses and examine them upon oath or affirmation, to receive depositions or other documentary evidence, and to assess the damages sustained against the responsible parties. The assessment of damages made by such board shall be subject to the approval of the commanding officer, and in the amount approved by him shall be stopped against the pay of the offenders. And the order of such commanding officer directing stoppages herein authorized shall be conclusive on any disbursing officer for the payment by him to the injured parties of the stoppages so ordered.

"Where the offenders can not be ascertained, but the organization or detachment to which they belong is known, stoppages to the amount of damages inflicted may be made and assessed in such proportion as may be deemed just upon the individual members thereof who are shown to have been present with such organization or detachment at the time the damages complained of were inflicted as determined by the approved findings of the board.

"ART. 106. Arrest of deserters by civil officials: It shall be lawful for any civil officer having authority under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, to arrest offenders, summarily to arrest a deserter from the military service of the United States and deliver him into the custody of the military authorities of the United States.

"ART. 107. Soldiers to make good time lost: Every soldier who in an existing or subsequent enlistment deserts the service of the United States or without proper authority absents himself from his organization, station, or duty for more than one day, or who is confined for more than one day under sentence, or while awaiting trial and disposition of his case, if the trial results in conviction, or through the intemperate use of drugs or alcoholic liquor, or through disease or injury the result of his own misconduct, renders himself unable for more than one day to perform duty, shall be liable to serve, after his return to a full-duty status, for such period as shall, with the time he may have served prior to such desertion, unauthorized absence, confinement, or inability to perform duty, amount to the full term of that part of his enlistment period which he is required to serve with his organization before being furloughed to the Army reserve.

"ART. 108. Soldiers—Separation from the service: No enlisted man, lawfully inducted into the military service of the United States, shall be discharged from said service without a certificate of discharge, signed by a field officer of the regiment or other organization to which the enlisted man belongs or by the commanding officer when no such field officer is present; and no enlisted man shall be discharged from said service before his term of service has expired, except by order of the President, the Secretary of War, the commanding officer of a department, or by sentence of a general court-martial.

"ART. 109. Oath of enlistment: At the time of his enlistment every soldier shall take the following oath or affirmation: 'I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America; that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies whomsoever; and that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and the orders of the officers appointed over me, according to the Rules and Articles of War.' This oath or affirmation may be taken before any officer.

"ART. 110. Certain articles to be read and explained: Articles 1, 2, and 29, 54 to 96, inclusive, and 104 to 109, inclusive, shall be read and explained to every soldier at the time of his enlistment or muster in, or within six days thereafter, and shall be read and explained once every six months to the soldiers of every garrison, regiment, or company in the service of the United States.

"ART. 111. Copy of record of trial: Every person tried by a general court-martial shall, on demand therefor, made by himself or by any person in his behalf, be entitled to a copy of the record of the trial.

"ART. 112. Effects of deceased persons—Disposition of: In case of the death of any person subject to military law, the commanding officer of the place or command will permit the legal representative or widow of the deceased, if present, to take possession of all his effects then in camp or quarters, and if no legal representative or widow be present, the commanding officer shall direct a summary court to secure all such effects; and said summary court shall have authority to convert such effects into cash, by public or private sale, not earlier than 30 days after the death of the deceased, and to collect and receive any debts due decedent's estate by local debtors; and as soon as practicable after converting such effects into cash said summary court shall deposit with the proper officer, to be designated in regulations, any cash belonging to decedent's estate, and shall transmit a receipt for such deposit, accompanied by any will or other papers of value belonging to the deceased, an inventory of the effects secured by said summary court, and a full account of his transactions to the War Department for transmission to the Auditor for the War Department for action as authorized by law in the settlement of the accounts of deceased officers or enlisted men of the Army; but if in the meantime the legal representative, or widow, shall present himself or herself to take possession of decedent's estate, the said summary court shall turn over to him or her all effects not sold and cash belonging to said estate, together with an inventory and account, and make to the War Department a full report of his transactions.

"The provisions of this article shall be applicable to inmates of the United States Soldiers' Home who die in any United States military hospital outside of the District of Columbia where sent from the home for treatment.

"ART. 113. Inquests: When at any post, fort, camp, or other place garrisoned by the military forces of the United States and under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, any person shall have been found dead under circumstances which appear to require investigation, the commanding officer will designate and direct a summary court-martial to investigate the circumstances attending the death; and for this purpose such summary court-martial shall have power to summon witnesses and examine them upon oath or affirmation. He shall promptly transmit to the post or other commander a report of his investigation and of his findings as to the cause of the death.

"ART. 114. Authority to administer oaths: Any judge advocate or acting judge advocate, the president of a general or special court-martial, any summary court-martial, the judge advocate or any assistant judge advocate of a general or special court-martial, the president or the recorder of a court of inquiry or of a military board, any officer designated to take a deposition, any officer detailed to conduct an investigation, and the adjutant of any command shall have power to administer oaths for the purposes of the administration of military justice and for other purposes of military administration; and in foreign places where the Army may be serving shall have the general powers of a notary public or of a consul of the United States in the administration of oaths, the execution and acknowledgment of legal instruments, the attestation of documents, and all other forms of notarial acts to be executed by persons subject to military law.

"ART. 115. Appointment of reporters and interpreters: Under such regulations as the Secretary of War may from time to time prescribe, the president of a court-martial or military commission, or a court of inquiry shall have power to appoint a reporter, who shall record the proceedings of and testimony taken before such court or commission and may set down the same, in the first instance, in shorthand. Under like regulations the president of a court-martial or military commission, or court of inquiry, or a summary court, may appoint an interpreter, who shall interpret for the court or commission.

"ART. 116. Powers of assistant judge advocates: An assistant judge advocate of a general court-martial shall be competent to perform any duty devolved by law, regulation, or the custom of the service upon the judge advocate of the court.

"ART. 117. Removal of civil suits: When any civil suit or criminal prosecution is commenced in any court of a State against any officer, soldier, or other person in the military service of the United States on account of any act done under color of his office or status, or in respect to which he claims any right, title, or authority under any law of the United States respecting the military forces thereof, or under the law of war, such suit or prosecution may at any time before the trial or final hearing thereof be removed for trial into the district court of the United States in the district where the same is pending in the manner prescribed in section 33 of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary,' approved March 3, 1911, and the cause shall thereupon be entered on the docket of said district court and shall proceed therein as if the cause had been originally commenced in said district court and the same proceedings had been taken in such suit or prosecution in said district court as shall have been had therein in said State court prior to its removal, and said district court shall have full power to hear and determine said cause.

"ART. 118. Officers, separation from service: No officer shall be discharged or dismissed from the service except by order of the President or by sentence of a general court-martial; and in time of peace no officer shall be dismissed except in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial or in mitigation thereof; but the President may at any time drop from the rolls of the Army any officer who has been absent from duty three months without leave or who has been absent in confinement in a prison or penitentiary for three months after final conviction by a court of competent jurisdiction.

"ART. 119. Rank and precedence among Regulars, Militia, and Volunteers: That in time of war or public danger, when two or more officers of the same grade are on duty in the same field, department, or command, or of organizations thereof, the President may assign the command of the forces of such field, department, or command, or of any organization thereof, without regard to seniority of rank in the same grade. In the absence of such assignment by the President, officers of the same grade shall rank and have precedence in the following order, without regard to date of rank or commission as between officers of different classes, namely: First, officers of the Regular Army and officers of the Marine Corps detached for service with the Army, by order of the President; second, officers of forces drafted or called into the service of the United States; and, third, officers of the volunteer forces: Provided, That officers of the Regular Army holding commissions in forces drafted or called into the service of the United States or in the volunteer forces shall rank and have precedence under said commissions as if they were commissions in the Regular Army; the rank of officers of the Regular Army under commissions in the National Guard as such shall not, for the purposes of this article, be held to antedate the acceptance of such officers into the service of the United States under the commissions.

"ART. 120. Command when different corps or commands happen to join: When different corps or commands of the military forces of the United States happen to join or do duty together the officer highest in rank of the line of the Regular Army, Marine Corps, forces drafted or called into the service of the United States or Volunteers, there on duty, shall, subject to the provisions of the last preceding article, command the whole and give orders for what is needful in the service, unless otherwise directed by the President.

"ART. 121. Complaints of wrongs: Any officer or soldier who believes himself wronged by his commanding officer, and, upon due application to such commander, is refused redress, may complain to the general commanding in the locality where the officer against whom the complaint is made is stationed. The general shall examine into said complaint and take proper measures for redressing the wrong complained of; and he shall, as soon as possible, transmit to the Department of War a true statement of such complaint, with the proceedings had thereon."

SEC. 4. The provisions of section 3 of this act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of March, 1917: Provided, That articles 4, 13, 14, 15, 29, 42, 47, 49, and 92 shall take effect immediately upon the approval of this act.

SEC. 5. That all offenses committed and all penalties, forfeitures, fines, or liabilities incurred prior to the taking effect of this act, under any law embraced in or modified, changed, or repealed by this act, may be prosecuted, punished, and enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 6. All laws and parts of laws in so far as they are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. Is the revenue bill now before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have received scores of telegrams in reference to the item concerning insurance companies in the revenue bill. I have read in the newspapers that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] proposes to offer an amendment to the bill covering that feature of it. Could the Senator now state in a few words just what he proposes to do in reference to the matter?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not sure that I know exactly to what feature of the bill the Senator from New Hampshire refers, but I think I know.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that a telegram which was this moment handed me—and I have scores of them on my desk, for they are all similar—states:

CLAREMONT, N. H., August 23, 1916—10.30 a. m.

Senator JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Washington, D. C.:

I protest against the continuance of the stamp tax on insurance policies and the 50-cent tax on each thousand dollars of capital and surplus. It seems unjust.

S. RICHARDSON,
General Insurance.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have made no statement to the newspapers with respect to those two matters. What I did state to the newspapers was that the House bill carried a provision wih reference to deductions in making income-tax returns of the reserve funds of insurance companies. Immediately above that in the House bill was the provision with reference to deductions on account of timber actually cut and sawed during the year. The Senate committee amended the provision with reference to timber, but left the provision of the House bill with reference to the deduction of reserve by insurance companies, but the clerk of the committee, in preparing the bill for the printer, inadvertently, in lining out the House provision with reference to timber, also lined out the provision immediately under it with reference to the reserves of insurance companies. It is a mere clerical mistake. I have so stated to the newspapers, and stated that, of course, that would be remedied on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will content myself by asking the Senator from North Carolina if he is in receipt of telegrams concerning this matter?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I have received telegrams and protests in reference to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are coming to me by scores, I may say.

Mr. SIMMONS. I also have received a great many telegrams and protests, just as the Senator from New Hampshire has.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the Senator from North Carolina will give them consideration, I take it for granted.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina if the provisions of the Senate and House bill are so different that possibly these senders of telegrams may be basing them on the provisions of the House bill instead of the provisions of the Senate bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what they are doing. They have seen that this provision in the House bill is cut out of the Senate bill—that is, lines are run through it—and they are sending these telegrams based upon the assumption that the Senate committee has cut them out. As the bill is reported they do appear to be cut out, and they are cut out; but, as a matter of fact, I say that that part of the elimination which relates to the reserves of insurance companies was not the action of the Senate committee, but were lined out by the inadvertence of the clerk in preparing the bill for the printer.

Mr. WEEKS. Then, the Senator has reason to think that these telegrams would not be sent if that provision were restored to the House bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not with respect to that item; but other telegrams are also coming protesting against the continuance of the stamp tax upon insurance policies and also protesting against the imposition of the tax of 50 cents on a thousand dollars' capital stock not only of insurance companies but of all other corporations.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from North Carolina listen to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] has been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. NELSON. Then I will ask the Senator from Connecticut to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. McLEAN. If it is only for a moment, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I will only take a few moments. What I desire to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to in reference to the insurance companies is the fact that I have been receiving scores of telegrams for the last three or four days relating to one subject, and it is not the subject to which the Senator from North Carolina has just referred. They relate to the stamp tax on insurance companies. I will read a brief statement from a letter which epitomizes the whole thing, so that the Senator can see the main issue that the insurance companies in my section of the country make on this question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I do not think he heard the statement I made. I have myself received quite a number of telegrams protesting against the stamp tax on insurance policies, and I know that a great many other Senators have received similar protests. They are based almost entirely upon the ground of discrimination against them in that, as they claim, they are the only corporation singled out for the continuance of the stamp tax.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator that I have avoided referring the telegrams to the committee or asking to have them read or printed in the RECORD; but here is the way in which the objection is stated by one of my correspondents:

From information received it seems that the new revenue bill increases the income tax from 1 per cent to 2 per cent, and also imposes a tax of 50 cents upon each thousand dollars of capital and surplus. It also continues in force the policy or premium tax, which I believe is one-half of 1 per cent on each dollar of premium written.

It is to that tax that they object. It is not the income tax, it is not the tax on capital surplus; but they say that this stamp tax on insurance policies which they will have to pay is a discrimination against them.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I have said.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will permit me one moment——

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. As I understand, the Senator from Connecticut is now going to speak on the revenue bill, and I shall hope to follow him with a few observations on the measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, the Chair has adopted the ordinary procedure of the Senate, not in accordance with any rule of the Senate, but according to custom, to take the names of the speakers.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not want to interfere with any other Senator who desires to speak. I did not know that any other Senator wanted to address the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has on the list the name of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] and then the name of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. PENROSE. Very well; that is agreeable to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And he will place the Senator from Pennsylvania next.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not hear the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I simply desired to advise the Chair that after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut I hoped to address the Senate; but the Chair informs me that the Senator from Alabama desires to address the Senate; and, of course, I do not desire to interfere with that Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no law governing this matter and no rule, but it has been the invariable custom.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand that, and it suits me.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, Federal obligations created at this session will fall little short of seventeen hundred millions of dollars. Nearly four hundred millions of this sum can be classed as extraordinary appropriations for the Army and Navy, and under existing conditions they are justified. But the thirteen hundred millions remaining are far in excess of those of any preceding session of Congress, and it is clear to me that at least one hundred millions might well have been saved. But it is too late now to reduce totals. It is probably too late to modify or change the ways and means by which it is proposed to raise this vast sum of money, but I consider it to be my duty to enter an emphatic protest against the indefensible scheme adopted by the framers of this bill. Waste and extravagance are inevitable in Government expenditure. The people will endure high taxes if they get their money's worth, but they will not endure unequal, unwise, or unnecessarily burdensome taxes. It is our plain duty to raise this enormous sum of money, if possible, in ways that will not reduce the producing or purchasing power of the people or embarrass and cripple State and community treasuries. The 1912 platform of the Democratic Party contains this declaration:

> We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

In the light of Democratic performances this promise reads like a joke. But there is a line in this plank of the Democratic platform of 1912 which is not a joke. It expresses one of the soundest of economic principles, namely, "high taxes reduce the purchasing power of the people's toil."

Granting that all the means and sources of revenue embraced in the pending bill are legitimate in the abstract, that they should all be monopolized by the Federal Government is utterly indefensible. It should always be borne in mind by Congress that under our system of State and community control of domestic and local affairs the number of separate and distinct public treasuries needing an annual influx of money runs into the tens of thousands. States, counties, and cities, besides school, fire, water, and sewage districts, all need money, and there is only one way in which it can be secured. It must be taken in taxes from the pockets of the people. The obligations of the States and their subdivisions now outstanding and the money required to meet current expenses are little short of astounding, according to the latest census returns:

Total bonded indebtedness of cities of 30,000 and over	3,148,584,718

1913.

Total bonded indebtedness of States	364,836,427
Total bonded indebtedness of counties	349,396,068
Total bonded indebtedness of incorporated places of 2,500 and over	3,254,031,015

Now let us look for a moment at the revenues that are required to meet current expenses by the States and their subdivisions:

Total revenue receipts of States	$458,232,597
Total revenue receipts of cities having a population of over 30,000	940,385,311

Total revenue receipts of States	367,585,331
Total revenue receipts of counties	370,043,046
Total revenue receipts of incorporated places of 2,500 and over	1,108,272,751

It is safe to say that the bonded indebtedness of the States and their subdivisions is in excess of $4,200,000,000 to-day, and that the annual revenues required to pay the running expenses of the States, counties, and incorporated places of 2,500 and over is in excess of $1,600,000,000. If we include all other incorporated public organizations, this sum must be increased by $500,000,000.

How are these vast sums of money to be raised? This most vital of all questions to the American people was apparently of no consequence to the framers of this bill.

Experience has taught that there is a clear choice of systems or norms of taxation to meet the requirements of the different corporate entities requiring public revenues. The American writers upon this subject who are not in politics, and whose arguments seem to me to be clearly unanswerable, insist that our Federal system of Government necessitates a most careful consideration of the means and methods by which public revenues are secured. From the very beginning down to the present day American statesmen and economists have recognized the wisdom of reserving certain separate and distinct sources of income for the Nation and leaving other sources to the States and their subdivisions; and up to date, except in times of war or great stress, neither political party has attempted to go outside of excise revenue and customs duties for money with which to pay the expenses of the Federal Government. An income tax has been resorted to in times of stress by both political parties. Probably the strongest advocate of this tax in the history of the country was Senator John Sherman in 1870, and its bitterest opponent was that great Democratic Senator, David B. Hill, in 1894. President Cleveland secured an income tax in 1895, which was afterwards declared unconstitutional. President Roosevelt recommended an income tax in his message of 1901, and President Taft, in June, 1909, sent a special message to Congress urging the immediate submission of a constitutional amendment giving Congress the power to lay an income tax.

There is nothing new in the income tax. The State of Connecticut collected an income tax from 1775 to 1800, and most of the States of the Union collected faculty or income taxes in the early days.

But the question as to whether or not it should be retained as a Federal tax or left entirely to the States or municipalities is an important one. If protective tariffs are to be abandoned, the Federal Government will be compelled to look to the income tax to make good the loss of customs duties. I realize that the party now in power is bound by political dogmas, sanctified by inheritance and reiterated platform pledge, to oppose protective tariffs as unconstitutional and extortionate; and whatever some of the northern and irresponsible members of the party may say on the stump before election, and however skillfully they may adjust the bait, the free-trade hook is still there and will remain as long as the Democratic Party remains.

Personally, I am in favor of an income tax as a Federal tax in the event reasonable customs duties should fail to produce sufficient money to meet Government expenditures. But why go beyond and cover every other field of taxation? This bill exhausts every source of income but the best one—the one approved by every civilized nation on earth.

I believe in a State inheritance tax, and I also believe that it should be left solely to the States. I challenge the gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber to suggest any sound economic reason for resorting to this tax as a Federal tax. It was not done even in the stress of the Civil War, when the Nation was sorely pressed for funds. Why invoke its aid in times of peace? The nonpartisan writers upon this subject all insist that certain taxable norms and sources of revenue should be left to the States and their subdivisions. Prof. Seligman, of Columbia University, whose recent work upon the income tax is recognized as both sound and nonpartisan, expresses himself very positively upon this subject in the following language:

> The third objection is one to which we have already alluded—the incorporation of an inheritance tax into the income-tax law. It was discussed above rather from the point of view of the theory of income. To say, however, that the inclusion of inheritance is unscientific does not settle the question whether it was correct to tax inheritances as such. It is, after all, immaterial whether the law provides for a separate inheritance tax or whether it is made a part of a nominal income tax. The real question is, Was it wise to impose an inheritance tax at all?
> To answer this query it is necessary to consider the relations between Federal and State taxes. From the very origin of our Government it has been the practice to make a difference between the two and to apportion to each Government certain sources of revenue upon which the other should not encroach. This principle has been violated only in some periods of extraordinary emergency or at other times in some minor legislation, as, for instance, in the case of the whisky taxes in Delaware and Kentucky, which conflict with the national internal-revenue system. But the introduction of the inheritance tax, even in the modified form of a tax on successions to personal property only, is a serious break with this principle of differentiation or segregation of source. One of the chief steps in the reform of American finance has been the growth of the inheritance tax as a Commonwealth tax and its development, together with the corporation tax, as a main, or in some cases almost an exclusive, source of Commonwealth revenue, thus permitting the other sources of revenue to be relegated to the local divisions. The imposition of a Federal inheritance tax, while perfectly justifiable in itself, would tend to check this salutary development. It would supply the Commonwealth with a reason for not adopting the inheritance tax as a source of State revenue, and it would render far more difficult a rounding out and logical arrangement of the entire tax system. It may be said that just as an income tax is far better as a national than as a State tax, because so many complicated questions of domicile and double taxation are avoided, so in the same way, and largely for the same reasons, a Federal inheritance tax is preferable to a State inheritance tax. But even if this be true, the advantage is dearly purchased at the cost of an entire reversal in the march of progress toward a consistent and logical revenue system for the entire country. It may be possible to find some method of filling the gap created in the Commonwealth tax system, but it seems a pity, to say the least, to check a promising movement when the difficulty of making any changes at all are so great as in the local tax systems of the United States at present.

It will be observed that Mr. Seligman also recommends that corporation taxes be left to States and municipalities. If you usurp and monopolize all sorts of income, except taxes on land, you will compel the States and towns to increase land taxes beyond endurance. Is it wise to go back to the farm upon such an errand? Our census reports show that State and municipal debts are growing by hundreds of millions of dollars every year. The people will have and ought to have good roads and schools and hospitals, and so forth, and the bills will constantly increase. If you insist upon rejecting the best means of securing Federal revenues, namely, customs duties, you should collect from other legitimate Federal sources, including the income tax, and leave the inheritance and corporation tax, or one of them at least, to the States.

If the Republican Party should be returned to power in November it will at once establish reasonable protection for American industries, I trust. The tariffs collected will certainly render the continuation of the inheritance tax unnecessary. It is easy to see the inequalities and injustices that must necessarily follow. Tens of thousands of estates probated in 1917, when the pending bill is in operation, will pay millions of dollars of inheritance taxes, but the tens of thousands of estates probated in 1918 will go free. This tax once adopted, as it has been in the States, is permanent, and while injustices result they will be fairly equalized in the course of time. If inheritance taxes are to be raised, let the States have the full benefit of them.

It has been often said that we do not know much about taxation in this country. Protective tariffs, however high, have largely been paid by the foreigner, and they have greatly encouraged diversity of industry and general prosperity. The time has now come apparently when we are to know all about all kinds of taxes in this country. It is of vital importance that we should start right and, if possible, keep right in our efforts to raise the vast sums of money that will be needed. Why should we tax the American over and over again in every single activity in which he is interested and let the foreigner do business in this country practically free from any taxes at all? The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have frequently announced that they intend to make the rich pay the expenses of the Government. I am not rich as riches go in these days, but I pay an income tax willingly and I see no special virtue in that willingness. The purpose of any man or set of men who stand up in legislative bodies and try to secure political success by assailing the rich is very apparent. But any man possessed of common sense knows that taxes must be paid before wages are paid. Not only taxes but all overhead charges and dividends will be paid before wages are paid. Individuals with large incomes can, and should willingly, pay a reasonable income tax, but if this tax or any other tax becomes vindictive and confiscatory it will soon find its way back to the producer and be taken from wages, and that will happen, which the Democratic Party in 1912 said would happen under high taxes, to wit, "The purchasing power of the people's toil will be reduced."

Again, the whole tendency and effect of this bill will be to encourage Federal dictation in State and community affairs. If the Federal Government exhausts the tax-paying power of the people the Federal Government must pay the public obligations. The State highways will soon have to depend entirely upon the Federal Treasury. A fair start in this direction has already been made by the good-roads bill passed this session. Next in order will come the schools, as evidenced by the Smith-Lever vocational education bill which was passed this session and for which millions of dollars were appropriated. Good roads and good schools are most worthy objects of public regard, but if turned over to Federal support the result will be to hasten the centralization of every governmental activity. This is one of the great dangers of the present day. If the States refuse or are unable to secure for the people all the social and political blessings to which they are entitled, Congress may well come to their rescue. But to encourage dependence upon Federal aid when State aid and community supervision will be far more satisfactory and far less expensive is a great mistake. I do not say that we have crossed the dead line yet, but I do say that the wholesale usurpation of local revenues under this bill will encourage if not make necessary Federal intermeddling with State and community control over all our local and domestic interests.

One more suggestion. If you are sincere in your desire to create a tariff commission to inquire into the cost of production abroad, you as a party must expect in the future to take the cost of production into consideration in laying customs duties. Of course, if you do that, you must recognize the principle of protection. If the tariff commission created by the pending bill finds the cost of production abroad far below that in this country, what do you expect to do? I see that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is in his seat, and he is to follow me, and I should be glad to have him answer that question. You ought as a party to frankly answer this question now. You also have an antidumping clause in this bill, but it applies only where the foreign producer attempts to unload his goods in this country at prices below those prevailing abroad. Now, what remedy do you propose if the goods are not offered below prevailing prices where manufactured but nevertheless are, in fact, sold here far below the cost of production of similar goods in this country? Certainly in such cases your antidumping law will be of no avail, yet the American producer will be subjected to disastrous competition. You ought to frankly state now what American industries may expect if such conditions are met. You propose in this bill to protect the manufacturer of dyestuffs after the war in order to start the industry in this country. Suppose after you have done this it develops that the industry can not continue to live without protection. Do you not see that when you protect an infant industry you concede the whole argument of protection and you must cease to be a tariff-for-revenue-only party? Do you not see that it is just as important to protect an industry 100 years old as one a month old when that industry is vital to the industrial life of the Nation? These questions that I have propounded you should answer before election day. It is clear to me that you are fooling yourselves and trying to fool the American people. Your latest tariff plank has been published to the world for more than two months. It emphatically indorses the Underwood tariff bill. You insist that the idea of protection was not entertained in framing that bill. Then your 1916 tariff plank proceeds with a lot of weasel phrases which seek to draw the free-trade blood out of the sentence indorsing the Underwood act and substitute protection serum. You have had more than two months to demonstrate to the people what you really mean by your latest platform jumble on the tariff. If as a party you had any idea of recognizing the protection principle, why do you not do it now? Why did you not do it when you framed this bill? You have enormous and extraordinary sums of money to raise. You have gone out into the byways and hedges and called to your aid every source of revenue but protective tariffs. Judged by your deeds rather than by your platform promises, you are trying to wiggle and slip by another election and then do as you please. You have no right to expect the confidence of the people. The reason why you have never been able to retain power for more than four years at a time is because of your mendacious and deceptive record upon this most vital of all questions to the American people. Why do you not now go into caucus and try to find out what your party means by its 1916 platform? Try to find out where you stand, and let the people know. There is time enough, and I can assure you that the great industrial interests of this country and the wage earners of this country would like to know where you stand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, when Thomas Jefferson founded the Democratic Party he made it enduring by imparting to it a broad philosophy and profound human interest. Principle, not expediency, distinguished it in the early days of the Republic. Shall it fail to so distinguish it to-day? In the nature of things the Democratic Party was always the party of the people, and all men who felt an impulse to champion the cause of the weak or the oppressed found themselves in the ranks of our party. So long as it battles for great principles and stands square to the rights of the common masses of the American people it will continue to be a great dominating force in American politics, whether it is in office or whether it is out of office; but once allow it to compromise principle for expediency, forget justice to the masses of the people in order that special interests may be placated, then defeat and disaster will inevitably come.

Among the great principles that have come down to us from the days of a Jefferson, a Madison, and a Jackson is the principle that in equality of taxation there is justice; that in the abuse of the taxing power of the Government there can only result injustice and oppression to the men and women of America. Of all the great powers that the several States surrendered to the Federal Government at the time of the adoption of our Constitution the most important was the granting of the right to the Federal Government to levy and collect taxes.

This is necessarily so. Without the power to tax the Federal Government could not exist. Without the power to raise revenue we could not maintain an Army and Navy, we could not organize the courts of the land—in fact, the machinery of the Government would stop.

But as the taxing power is the greatest power, the most necessary power, that was delegated to the Federal Government by the several States, it can also be said the power to tax is the most dangerous power that the several States surrendered to the Federal Government. The power to tax carries with it the power to destroy. The power to tax carries with it the power to build up one man at the expense of the many. The power to tax gives the Congress of the United States the opportunity to discriminate in favor of the few as against the many.

I think at this time it is well to take stock of the present political conditions. It is well for us to define the great principles that control the party in power in levying taxation before we attempt to analyze the legislation that has already been passed by the present administration and the legislation that will be passed before we adjourn this Congress. If we sail the ship of state true to our principles we may make minor mistakes, but we will carry it safely into port. But if we compromise with our principles in writing legislation there is no telling what dangers may confront us now and in the future, and we abandon all justification for our having been returned to power four years ago.

The principle which guides the Democratic Party when it is writing revenue bills has been clearly defined in its party platforms, but I know of no clearer definition of the principle than that which is defined in the party platform of 1892, when the party won a great victory in the country, and in the party platform of 1912, when it again was returned to power by a tremendous majority in both branches of Congress and succeeded in regaining the Presidency of the United States. The Democratic platform of 1892 made this declaration:

> We denounce Republican protection as a fraud—a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few. We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purposes of revenue only, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of the Government when honestly and economically administered.

In 1912 there was the second great victory of the Democratic Party after the War between the States, because while it is true that we elected Mr. Cleveland President of the United States in 1884, at no time during that administration did the Democratic Party control absolutely the legislative branch of the Government, and it was only following the election in 1892 and in 1912 that we succeeded to the control of both the Presidency and the legislative branches of the Government so that we were enabled to write our principles into law on the statute books of the country.

The platform of 1912 says:

> We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of government honestly and economically administered.

We are not limited in our declaration of principles to our party platform. We have statements coming from the great party chieftains who carried the banner of Democracy in these respective victories. After the election of 1892 Grover Cleveland, in delivering his inaugural address on the 4th day of March, 1893, referring to the question of taxation and customs duties, made this statement:

> When we tear aside the delusions and misconceptions which have blinded our countrymen to their condition under vicious tariff laws, we but show them how far they have been led away from the paths of contentment and prosperity. When we proclaim that the necessity for revenue to support the Government furnishes the only justification for taxing the people, we announce a truth so plain that its denial would seem to indicate the extent to which judgment may be influenced by familiarity with perversions of the taxing power. And when we seek to reinstate the self-confidence and business enterprise of our citizens by discrediting an abject dependence upon governmental favor, we strive to stimulate those elements of American character which support the hope of American achievement.

There can be no question, Mr. President, about the meaning of that ringing declaration of Democratic principles coming from a man who supported the principles of the Democratic Party with courage and without compromise.

But we can come to a later declaration on this subject. After the Democratic Party was returned to power its first official act was to rewrite the customs tariff laws. Those laws were written in accord with the principles of the party, the fundamental principles, that taxes should be levied for the purpose of raising the necessary revenue to support the Government and not for the purpose of building up special interests.

I take it that there is not a man on the Democratic side of this Chamber who will deny the proposition that the tariff act of October, 1913, was written to accord with Democratic principles and to harmonize with the doctrine that the purpose of levying taxation was for the purpose of raising revenue.

I am satisfied that there is no Senator on the Republican side of this Chamber who will contend that the present tariff law was not written for the purpose of revenue and was not enacted for the purpose of protecting industries. There may be an incidental protection growing out of the levying of any tax. There is; we are bound to admit it. But the purpose of writing your revenue bills is the question that governs, and I am satisfied that there is not a Republican Senator who will deny the purpose that supported the action of the membership of the Democratic Party in the House and in the Senate in enacting the present tariff law.

That law was signed by the President of the United States on the evening of October 13, 1913. At the time of the signing of the act he invited the members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and the members of the Finance Committee of the Senate and others to be present to witness the signing of that bill, and after affixing his signature to the document he made this statement to those who were present.

> I feel a very peculiar pleasure in what I have just done by way of taking part in the completion of a great piece of business. It is a pleasure which is very hard to express in words which are adequate to express the feeling, because the feeling that I have is that we have done the rank and file of the people of this country a great service. It is hard to speak of these things without seeming to go off into campaign eloquence; but that is not my feeling. It is one very profound, a feeling of profound gratitude that, working with the splendid men who have carried this thing through with studious attention and doing justice all around, I should have had part in serving the people of this country as we have been striving to serve them since I can remember.
> I have had the accomplishment of something like this at heart ever since I was a boy, and I know men standing around me who can say the same thing, who have been waiting to see the things done which it was necessary to do in order that there might be justice in the United States. And so it is a solemn moment that brings such a business to a conclusion, and I hope I will not be thought to be demanding too much of my colleagues when I say that this, great as it is, is the accomplishment of only half the journey. We have set the business of this country free from those conditions which have made monopoly not only possible, but in a sense easy and natural.

Mr. President, could the leader of his party announce in more solemn and sincere language his approval of a party measure and his commitment to party principle than Woodrow Wilson announced when, as President of the United States, he gave life and vitality to the present revenue laws of this land by affixing his signature to the bill that had just been enacted by his party?

So I say there can not be any difference of opinion as to where the Democratic Party has stood in the past and for what principles it contended when it enacted the present revenue law. There was no doubt on that subject in the House of Representatives when the bill was originated. In presenting the tariff bill to the House of Representatives at that time, standing as the representative of my party, I made this statement:

> The Democratic Party stands for a tariff for revenue only, with emphasis upon the world "only." We do not propose to tax one man for the benefit of another, except for the necessary revenue that we must raise to administer this Government economically.
> Then, how do we arrive at a basis in writing a revenue tariff bill? We adopt the competitive theory. We say that no revenue can be produced at the customhouse unless there is some competition between the products of foreign countries and domestic products; that if you put the wall so high that you close the door to importation no revenue can be raised; and that if you want to raise revenue at the customhouse you must admit some importations before the tax will fall upon them and revenue be derived.

I was speaking to the Republican side of the House—

> You have for 50 years played favorites. You have given to your chosen minions the power to tax the American people by building prohibitive tariff walls and you have opened the gates of those walls to get revenue from those for whom you did not care. In this bill we have not been able at one fell swoop to wipe out all iniquities, the injustices, and the favoritism that you have ingrafted on the body politic in five decades. But so far as this committee and our party is concerned, we have played favorites with no man. No favored manufacturer has sat behind the closed doors of the Ways and Means Committee to dictate the taxes that he should be allowed to levy on the American people.
> The real question that we have to consider is that of the rights and interests of the consuming masses of the American people. The question of industry in this country is, and from our standpoint must always be, seconded to the right and necessities of the great American consuming public.

Mr. President, I do not think it is possible for a party to have more clearly defined its principles in the enactment of legislation that the Democratic Party has defined its principles in the enactment of the present law. There is no particular charm, there is no fetishism in declaring that we stand for the principle that taxation should be levied only for the purpose of raising revenue. There is nothing in the word; it is the great principle that stands behind the word that gives vitality and life and substance to the declaration of our party. From the beginning we recognized that the taxing power should only be used in the interest of the people; that it should only be used to support the Government.

Almost from the beginning the Republican Party has acted upon the principle that the power to tax at the customhouse should be used for the purpose primarily of building up industry in the United States; that the primary purpose should be to prevent competition, and, ultimately, to foster monopoly by the use of the taxing power. The question of raising revenue was a secondary principle. Fortunately for you and your principles, in the early days after your party came into power you could levy taxes at the customhouse to build up industry and at the same time secure revenue; but you and the American people may as well realize now as to-morrow that that day has passed. You were enabled to levy very high rates of taxation at the customhouse upon foreign products competing with home industry, and yet raise large amounts of revenue. Why? Because when you came into power the industries of this country had not developed to be the great monopolies that exist to-day. There was hardly a branch of industry in the United States, if one, when your party first came into power, and during the first two decades of your administration, that was able to manufacture sufficient of its products to supply the needs of the American people. You had a growing and an expanding West, with immigration coming in from foreign lands and continually building up new markets for your industries within the confines of continental United States, with the result that you were enabled to levy high taxes at the customhouse, and yet importations had to come through, because your home products were not sufficient to supply the American market.

Take the great steel and iron industry. Some time between the seventies and the eighties—I do not recall the exact date—you raised in the neighborhood of $25,000,000 of revenue from that schedule alone. At that time, if my recollection serves me aright, you had a tax on steel rails of $13.44 a ton; you had a tax on pig iron of $6.72 a ton, and the remainder of your iron and steel schedule was fixed on that basis; and yet you raised enormous revenue at the customshouse from that schedule, because your industry had not then grown to the extent that it could supply the needs of the American people. You ground out of them these enormous taxes to make princes in the iron and steel business, to make fabulous fortunes for private individuals that have come down to us to-day.

But under this hot-house development, encouraged by the enormous artificial profits that you had created, the revenue dropped and dropped and dropped at the customhouse, and you reduced and reduced and reduced your tariff taxes on the iron and steel schedule, until the day came when you went out of power, when you hardly raised one-fourth of the revenue at the customhouse on iron and steel that you had formerly raised, and you had reduced your tax on steel rails to $3.92 a ton and you had reduced your tax on pig iron to $2.50 a ton, if my recollection serves me aright. That was the result of protection and overprotection.

Now, what is true of the iron and steel schedule—and I only give it by way of illustration—is true of other great schedules, and of most of the great industries of this country. You have developed them until on most lines they are able to supply the American people with the entire product that they desire to consume; and when you put a protective tariff duty back on those schedules at the customhouse, you will not get revenue, but you will cut off revenue entirely, and only make the strain on other sources of revenue the greater if you follow your avowed principles.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. OWEN. Is not the doctrine that you may put a prohibitive tariff for the purpose of preventing imports under the plea of raising revenue unconstitutional and a fraudulent interpretation of the Constitution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as the interpretation that our fathers in the Democratic faith have given us, they accord with the views which the Senator from Oklahoma has expressed. So far as to what the Supreme Court of the United States may say, that is a different question, because the court will not interpret the purpose of our act.

I do not wish it to be said that I have announced that no more revenue could be raised at the customhouse than we raise under the present law. Additional revenue could be raised under a revenue tariff. If you played no favorites and gave every industry in this country a like protection under a protective tariff, you would cut down the revenue that we would raise and would not increase it; but you never have distributed your favors with even-handed justice. There never has been a day in the legislative history of your party when you were confronted with enacting customs laws that you did not play favorites, and you will do it again. You will give to the selected few the right to monopolize and abuse the American market, and you will open the sluice gates of competition on those for whom you do not care. You could raise more revenue at the customhouse. We lost $19,000,000 of revenue by taking the tax off raw wool; but we did it in order that we might reduce taxes at the top, in order that we might lessen the burden of taxes on the man who wears a woolen shirt, and on the American people who consume woolen goods, in order that our woolen industries might develop and grow and have an opportunity with free raw materials to go beyond the seas and to build up their industry in foreign markets, as the iron and steel industry has done in the past under a lessening tariff.

Your system of taxation as applied to the wool industry was to establish a prohibitive tax and you kept it so high that the industry never grew, and it never developed a foreign market.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In one moment. I shall yield as soon as I finish this sentence.

In your policy on the iron and steel schedule conditions forced you to make continual reductions, these reductions broadened and strengthened it and made it a great industry, that grew by leaps and bounds and developed immense trade in foreign countries. Now I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the Senator's exposition of his views on the tariff question. I know he always states frankly and freely what he stands for, but I am sometimes puzzled to reconcile the statements made by him and the leading members of his party before election and subsequent action on the part of Democratic Congresses. Therefore, with the Senator's permission, I want to call his attention to some remarks which he made in Connecticut in 1912. He may remember that at that time he engaged in a joint debate with Representative HILL in Waterbury. I now quote from the leading Democratic paper of Connecticut, the issue of October 16, 1912, the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, as follows:

> Now, let me see where the difference between these two great parties is. He [Mr. HILL] says we are a free-trade party. I deny it. There is a clean distinction. Whenever you cut off competition, then you are damming back revenue, and your tariff is levied for the purpose of protecting somebody's profits, and not for the purpose of getting revenue for the Government. When you equalize exactly the difference in cost at home and abroad, if you can do it—it is impossible to do it exactly, but you can approximate it—but when you do that, you have got a competitive tariff.

As I understand, the Senator from Alabama at that time was in favor of what he called "a competitive tariff," and was endeavoring to define his position. Then he goes on to say:

> Now, there are two sides to this question. There is not a particle of possibility that the Democratic Party will not equalize the difference in labor cost at home and abroad.

Now, we come to Congress and we get a tariff bill after the election, and in the report of the Committee on Ways and Means, of which the Senator from Alabama was chairman, I find this language:

> The statement is therefore made that no part of the committee's work has been founded upon a belief in the cost of production theory, and the theory is absolutely rejected as a guide in tariff making.

I understand that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, most positively and emphatically reiterates that in the framing of that tariff law the cost of production theory was rejected, and all idea of protection was rejected.

The Senator from Alabama has explained here his view as to the necessary protection which may come from a revenue tariff. What I would like to have him state now is whether, in framing a tariff law, he believes, as he stated in Waterbury, that cost of production at home and abroad should be taken into consideration in equalizing the economic differences in cost of production?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is drawing his own conclusions from what I said. What I said in Waterbury is in absolute accord with what I said in the report which I had the privilege of making as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to the House when the present tariff law was reported, and what I have just stated is in entire accord with what I stated in Waterbury. I did not state in Waterbury that I believed in taking the difference in cost of production as the guide in writing a tariff bill. I stated there that the Democratic Party stood for the principle of writing a tariff for revenue only; but I did state that the dividing line between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff was clearly defined at the point where the difference in cost at home and abroad is found, because whenever you had the costs equalized you had competition; you were not damming back competition for the purpose of protecting profits; but when you went one cent above the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, then you were protecting profits, you were not levying tariff taxes for revenue, but you were levying them for protection, in order that some man might make more profit out of his industry than he would if he had fair competition.

There is no conflict between what I said at Waterbury and what I say here. The only respect in which the Senator might challenge my statement is that I said that the Democratic Party would not reduce the tariff below the difference in the wage cost; and, save only in exceptional instances, where we were compelled to put articles on the free list, we have not done so, as I will demonstrate by authentic reports of governmental departments before I get through this speech.

However, while the Senator has that point in view, and in order to show exactly what I did say on the subject, I should like to have the Secretary read from the report I made for the Ways and Means Committee on the 22d day of April, 1913, which accompanied H. R. 3321, commonly known as the tariff bill. I will ask the Secretary to read the first two pages that are marked, first, what was stated with reference to the cost-of-production theory, and, second, what was said in reference to a competitive tariff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OWEN in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

COST-OF-PRODUCTION THEORY REJECTED.

The so-called theory of cost of production as a regulator of rates was fully discussed at the time tariff-revision bills were introduced by the Ways and Means Committee during the Sixty-second Congress. It will be recalled that much was said by protection advocates in support of the view that it was incumbent upon the United States to maintain a system of tariff rates that would cover differences in cost of production between the United States and foreign countries in addition to a reasonable margin of profit. That doctrine became the basis of the work of the tariff board, which furnished reports to the President, later transmitted by the Executive to Congress, concerning wool and woolens, cottons, pulp, and paper. Many manufacturers have presented arguments based on the doctrine of comparative costs. The statement is therefore made that no part of the committee's work has been founded upon a belief in the cost-of-production theory, and the theory is absolutely rejected as a guide to tariff making. The general basis for this position the committee gives in its Report No. 455 (62d Cong., 2d sess., to accompany H. R. 22195), stating that the view that the proper basis for tariff duties is found by comparing money costs of production, is based upon the idea that money costs represent the relative degrees of sacrifice involved in turning out commodities of a given kind in various countries. For instance, if it is assumed that a given unit of a certain commodity can be produced in England at $1, or the equivalent of that sum, while in the United States the money expenses of production are $1.25, it is necessary to have a tariff duty equal to the difference in these money expenses of production, or certainly to the difference in money expenses minus the allowance for variations in freight rates, in order to place the producers in the two countries upon an equal market footing. Continuing the assumption, if this is not done, it will be possible for the producer in the country where money expenses are lowest to drive out of business the producer in the country where money expenses are highest. This assumption is based upon an erroneous view of international trade, and finds no warrant whatever in economic reasoning.

In certain classes of goods prices or selling values are fixed not by the cost of producing at the point of lowest cost but by the cost of producing at the point of highest cost. This is true of every commodity subject to the law of diminishing returns. In the case of such commodities the price is universally admitted to be fixed ultimately by the cost of producing that portion of the supply which is brought into existence under the least favorable conditions, provided that all portions of the supply are necessary to satisfy a given demand. Thus, if the price of wheat is 75 cents a bushel, wheat will command that figure independent of whether it is produced at 25, 50, 75 cents, or $1 per bushel. The price is fixed by a comparison of demand and supply, and cost of production merely affords the limit which determines the range of prices. This is a familiar condition in connection with agricultural commodities, in which production continues on unfertile lands, even though very much beter soil may be in use. The better soil does not drive the poorer soil out of cultivation unless there is so much of the better that it is unnecessary to cultivate the poorer soil. Where soils of different grades are employed the price of the product has nothing to do with cost of production, but is determined ultimately by the cost of production of the most expensive unit of the desired supply. It is evident in these cases that a study of the difference in cost of production would have no relation to the amount of tariff needed to protect industries in one country against the competition of those in another.

There are also numerous commodities whose production is carried on in countries which have a much smaller natural aptness for them than do others, because the latter, which might compete successfully with them, have a far greater advantage in producing some other commodity. Thus, if State No. 1 can produce both corn and wheat more cheaply than State No. 2, it does not follow that it will do so. If its advantage in the production of wheat is disproportionately greater than its advantage in the production of corn, it will devote attention chiefly or wholly to that commodity in which it has the greatest surplus of productive power. In this case a study of the difference of money expenses of production will throw no light whatever upon the amount of tariff needed in order to equalize conditions of production. There are numerous instances in which a condition of this kind exists—a country having the decided advantage in a certain commodity, but producing it only to a very limited extent, because there is a greater field for its capital in other directions. In such cases ascertaining that the money cost of producing a given article in the country of great advantage is lower than in the less favored country does not indicate the necessity of a tariff duty upon this article in the less favored country, because the more favored will not produce it to any considerable extent in any event.

Even in those instances where two countries are actively and extensively engaged in producing a manufactured article whose price is determined by cost of production under the most favorable conditions, as is the case with many largely manufactured articles, such as shoes, cloth, and the like, a difference in money cost of production is no indication of comparative competitive power. In order to have it do so there must be an ascertainment of the relative efficiency of labor, as well as of the extent to which given money expenses are the result of already existing tariff duties. If expenses of production have been rendered higher by tariff duties, so that the cost of producing an article whose raw material is increased in price by tariff duties, the fact of higher money expenses of production does not necessarily indicate inferiority in productive power as to that particular article.

It should also be noted that in every country there is a great range of difference in cost of production. Scarcely any commodity has a uniform cost of production. There is more difference, as a rule, between factories in the same country than between the best and poorest factories in one country and those of corresponding grades in another. In the report of the Tariff Board on pulp and paper little difference was found in money cost of production between the United States and Canada in the best mills, but a very great difference in expense of production was found between the best and poorest mills in the United States. The conclusion would have been, therefore, that while protection was not needed by the best factories in the United States against the Canadian factories it was needed by the poorer factories in the United States against the better factories, but not against those in Canada. Owing to this variation in cost of production within the same country, it is not possible to compare in absolute terms the productive power of one country with that of another.

Only averages can be taken, and these show nothing as to any given case. In order to have the cost-of-production theory mean anything, it must be qualified by provisions showing whether it is intended to apply to differences between the best factories in two countries or the difference between the poorest factories in one country and the best in another. Otherwise it will indicate nothing, since a tariff which would protect the best factory in one country will not protect the poorest factory there, or perhaps even the average factory. A duty which will equalize the average difference in cost of production between two countries protects no one, since it is more than is needed by the most efficient producer and less than is needed by the least efficient producer.

1. Money expenses of production must be ascertained from books designed to show manufacturing costs. There is no uniformity in methods of cost accounting, and many factories employ no cost-accounting system. Cost figures obtained without cost books are of very little service. Such figures obtained from sets of books which are kept in different ways are of equally little service. This is true in the textile industries to a very great extent, a condition admitted by the Tariff Board throughout their report.

2. Even if money costs could be actually ascertained on a comparative basis in an unquestionable manner, they must be secured not merely from one country but from every competing country, so that the extent or scope of competition against which the United States must exert itself may be known. It might very well be that one country would have a low money cost of production, but this would be of little significance, as that country could not indefinitely increase the amount of its production.

3. Even if the facts could be ascertained in absolutely accurate form for all competing foreign countries, the figures would be of little service as a guide in fixing tariff duties because it would not be known in any given case whether such costs afforded the basis for fixing prices. They do not invariably afford such a basis. Wherever monopoly conditions exist, wherever the export price system exists, and wherever patents are an important factor in production, the mere ascertainment of the cost of production is of little importance. It is far more significant in such cases to know the range of actual selling prices over a long period.

4. Inasmuch as variations in money cost of production have no particular significance unless they correspond to relative sacrifice of labor and capital, and inasmuch as they do not so correspond except in countries whose price levels are about the same, no safe conclusion can be drawn from differences in cost regarding the extent to which a country with a low money cost will be able to undersell or compete with a country subject to a high money cost.

The situation is exemplified in the case of railroad rates, where the constant effort is to fix the rates upon a reasonable basis; yet this almost invariably results in giving to the well-built and efficiently managed roads too large a margin of profit, while it does not give sufficient margin to those overcapitalized, badly constructed, or inefficiently managed. The addition of a "reasonable profit" over and above the difference in the cost of production very greatly complicates the problem and makes the impossible in theory positively absurd in application.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have had read what the committee said in rejection of the theory of the difference in cost of production as a basis for levying customs taxes. Now I ask the Secretary to read what the report stated in reference to a competitive tariff, which I think will demonstrate to the Senator from Connecticut that what I said at Waterbury is carried out by what I said in reporting the tariff bill to the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THEORY OF A COMPETITIVE TARIFF.

The dividing line between the positions of the two great parties on this question is very clear and easily ascertained in theory. Where the tariff rates balance the difference in cost at home and abroad, including an allowance for the difference in freight rates, the tariff must be competitive, and from that point downward to the lowest tariff that can be levied it will continue to be competitive to a greater or less extent. Where competition is not interfered with by levying the tax above the highest competitive point, the profits of the manufacturer are not protected. On the other hand, when the duties levied at the customhouse are high enough to allow the American manufacturer to make a profit before his competitor can enter the field, we have invaded the domain of the protection of profits. In our judgment the protection of any profit must of necessity have a tendency to destroy competition and create monopoly, whether the profit protected is reasonable or unreasonable.

We should bear in mind that to establish a business in a foreign country requires a vast outlay, both in time and capital. Should the foreign manufacturer attempt to establish himself in this country, he must advertise his goods, establish selling agencies and points of distribution before he can successfully conduct his business. After he has done so, if the home producer is protected by a law that not only equals the difference in cost at home and abroad, but also protects a reasonable or unreasonable profit, it is only necessary for him to lower his prices slightly below the point that the law has fixed to protect his profits and his competitor must retire from the country or become a bankrupt, because he would then have to sell his goods at a loss and not a profit. The foreign manufacturer having retired, the home producer could raise his prices to any level that competition would allow him, and it is not probable that the foreigner, who had already been driven out of the country, would return, no matter how inviting the field, as long as the law remained on the statute books that would enable his competitor to put him out of business.

Thirty or forty years ago, with a large number of small manufacturers, honest competition, no attempt to restrict trade, and a home market more than able to consume the production of our mills and factories, the danger and the injury to the consumer of the country was neither so great nor so apparent as it is to-day, when the control of many large industries has been concentrated in the hands of a few. Domestic competition then regulated prices to a reasonable extent even where foreign competition was prohibited. When we ceased having competition at home, and the law prohibits competition from abroad by protecting profits, there is no relief for the consumer except to cry out for Government regulation. There is no more reason or justice in having the Government attempt to protect the profits of the manufacturers and producers of this country than there would be to protect the profits of the merchant or the lawyer, the banker or the farmer, or the wages of the laboring man. By reason of the efficient use of American machinery by American labor, in most of the manufactures of this country the labor cost per unit of production is no greater here than abroad. It is admitted, of course, that the actual wage of the American laborer is in excess of European countries, but as to most articles the labor wage in this country is not more than double the labor wage abroad.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama further yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. Unless the Senator desires to comment on this report, I should like to suggest that it does not seem to me that it demonstrates harmony between the statement made by the Senator in Waterbury and his statement as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and I will indicate to him why, to the best of my ability.

The report that has been read takes the ground that it is impossible to estimate the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, or so nearly impossible that it is impracticable.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is. There is no question about that.

Mr. McLEAN. And the Senator in Waterbury clearly stated that you may approximate it. Then he went on to say in Waterbury that there is not a particle of possibility that the Democratic Party will not equalize the difference in labor cost at home and abroad.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; labor cost; but I did not say that we would write our tax on the basis of the difference of cost of production. That is a very different question.

Mr. McLEAN. Wait just one minute. I do not care to prolong this debate. If I understand the Senator, it will not be necessary for me to continue my questions. As I understand him, his position is that while the difference in economic cost of production can not be ascertained so as to be of any practical benefit, nevertheless, accidentally or incidentally, his tariff may give protection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstands me. I do not contend at all that the present tariff was written to give protection or would give protection in the sense that the Senator from Connecticut defines protection; that is, a protection that will protect the profits of a manufacturer.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be glad if the Senator will allow me to answer him—in other words, a protection that will more than equalize the difference in cost at home and abroad. I do not contend that. I never have contended it. What I mean when I say that any revenue tariff will give some protection is not in the technical sense in which the Senator uses the word, but is in the broader sense that any tax levied at the customhouse to some extent dams back competition; and the damming back of that competition, no matter how infinitesimally small it may be, to that extent is an advantage to the man inside the tariff wall.

Mr. McLEAN. That is just what I say. It is incidental. It is not intentional.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly not; and I have never contended for intentional protection.

When I was interrupted by the Senator from Connecticut I was discussing the possibility of the Republican Party raising the revenue to support this Government under its theory of a protective tariff, and I had stated that I did not contend that more tariff taxes could not be raised at the customhouse than were raised in normal times under existing law. You can levy a tax on raw wool; but would the representatives of the people of New England and New York, the great manufacturers of wool, who may some day desire to go to foreign markets to sell their surplus products, desire to return to a Republican system of taxing raw wool at the customhouse, enhancing and increasing enormously the burden on the American people, and hampering the industry in its efforts to build up foreign trade?

The Democratic Party can raise more revenue at the customhouse under its theory of taxes for revenue only. It can levy a tax on tea. There would be no protection in that. Practically no tea is grown in this country.

It could levy a tax on coffee. There would be no protection in that, because outside of the small amount of coffee that is grown in Porto Rico, most of which goes to Europe, there is no coffee grown in this country. There are many items on which you could levy a revenue tariff at the customhouse and raise additional revenue, but there are few items on which you could levy a protective tariff—a tariff that was greater than the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, a tariff levied to protect profits—in which you would not dam back revenue instead of increasing it.

The hour has come in this country where, on the one hand, the growth of the great American industries has supplied the consuming public, and on the other hand an enormous additional need for revenue has been presented to us by the increase of the Army and the Navy, when you must adopt one or two methods of collecting taxes: You must levy your tax on wealth or you must levy your tax on consumption. You must levy your tax on the accumulations of mankind or you must levy your tax on the numbers of mankind.

I believe in an income tax. I think one of the greatest provisions of the present revenue law is the fact that for the first time in the history of this country as a matter of permanent legislation it established the principle of taxing wealth, and no matter whether you return to power some day in the distant future or not the Republican Party will not repeal the income-tax law, because it will not deny recognition of the principle the Democratic Party has put on the statute books, that wealth receives a greater protection from this Government than poverty, and wealth should bear a larger percentage of the burdens of government than poverty.

If you were returned to power to-morrow, you would keep the income tax on the statute books as a matter of necessity. You might changes its details, but you could not change the principle. If you were returned to power to-morrow, you would find that you could not increase your revenue at the customhouse by applying Republican principles, and the only way you could get an increased revenue at the customhouse would be by levying your taxes for revenue and not for protection, which you never have done heretofore.

But the charge has been made that the Democratic Party, in enacting its tariff legislation, has injured the great industrial development of America; and when it is pointed out to you that there is a wonderful era of prosperity in the United States, that bank balances and bank clearances have never been so large, that there has never before been the amount of idle money in the country hunting investment that there is at present, that interest rates have never been lower, that every man in the United States who desires employment can get it, that the production of our furnaces and our factories has never been greater—when you are faced with these indisputable facts of American prosperity and American success under the laws that are now on the statute books, you answer by saying that this is brought about by the European war; that it did not exist prior to the beginning of the European war; that this country was then threatened with a deluge of importations; that disaster and hard times threatened the country.

You must remember that we inherited dull times from your administration when our party came into power; that times after we came into power were gradually improving and getting better, money conditions were being relieved, men were beginning to be employed, until the outbreak of the war in Europe; and when that great calamity happened it paralyzed trade, it destroyed confidence, it closed down establishments. Men were unable to look into the future. They knew that a large portion of their goods had crossed the seas and gone into foreign trade; that the contending nations of Europe were battling for the sea and destroying commerce; that their markets in a large portion of Europe were closed. They hesitated about conducting their business. They slowed down the machine to see what was going to happen by reason of this foreign war. More than that, the great banking interest of this country became paralyzed with an unwarranted fear for the future. It came to the floor of Congress and told us that if relief were not granted immediately American markets would be deluged by the dumping of American securities, and that something must be done to protect against it.

Well, the Democratic Congress did endeavor to protect the country against an untoward disaster, if it should ever happen; but it never happened. Those business men were unduly alarmed. Europe did not dump its securities; and an attempt is being made by laws in Europe to-day to make Europeans sell their American securities, in order that they can settle their balance of trade to this country. But it was that apprehension and that fear that for a few months temporarily paralyzed certain great business interests in this country. It was only temporary. As soon as confidence was restored, business not only moved back to the ordinary channels of trade but has developed to an unprecedented extent.

But you, in your contentions, will not admit what I say. You attempt to confess and avoid; you have stated that before this war in Europe came on the present tariff laws enacted by the Democratic Party were injuring and destroying this country.

Now I wish to call to your attention the facts in reference to the effect foreign imports have had on domestic production as shown by Government reports. I hold in my hand Senate Document 366, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, entitled "Foreign Commerce and the Tariff, 1899–1915." On page 11, under the head of "Recent trade movement," I find a statement, which I will read, in reference to imports coming into the United States. Now, this is not a statement of mine; it is not an idle criticism, but it is a statement of facts as shown by the statistics gathered from the importations coming into the customhouse. This report says:

> During the 17 years covered by the report, 1899–1915, there has been a gain in imports of approximately $1,000,000,000. The general movement therefore has been decidedly upward at the rate computed arithmetically of about $60,000,000 a year. If the gain is computed according to a fixed percentage rate, say 6 per cent each year, the annual increase at the beginning of the period would be about $40,000,000, and at the close $100,000,000. In 12 of the 17 years embraced in Table 1 an increase in imports over the previous year is shown, varying from $245,000,000 in the fiscal year 1910 to $80,000,000 in the fiscal year 1902, and in percentage varying from 22 per cent in the fiscal year 1900 to 4 per cent in the fiscal year 1914. The only years showing decreases are 1901, 1904, 1908, 1911, and 1915.

Again, on the same page, the statement is made:

> Measured on the basis of general imports, the fiscal year 1914 shows an increase of only $81,000,000, or 4.5 per cent, as compared with an increase of $160,000,000, or 9.7 per cent, in the fiscal year 1913.

Which, I will say in passing, was the last year of your Republican tariff law, as compared with 1914, the first year of our tariff law.

It goes on to say:

> The percentage gain in the fiscal year 1914 is less than in any of the other 11 years that show an increase. Measured on the imports for consumption basis, however, the increase in the fiscal year 1914 is slightly greater than the increase in the fiscal year 1913, amounting to $140,000,000, or 7.9 per cent, in the fiscal year 1914 against $126,000,000, or 7.7 per cent, in the fiscal year 1913. The actual increase in the fiscal year 1914 was exceeded in 3 years, and the relative increase was exceeded in 9 years of the 17 years covered by the report.

And mark you, of the 17 years covered by this report, 16 were under your tariff law, and only 1 was under our tariff law.

The report goes on to say:

> It appears, therefore, that the increase in the imports during the fiscal year 1914 can not be regarded as abnormally large even if measured on the imports for consumption basis, while the percentage increase in the general imports is much less than that for the majority of the years from 1899 to 1915.

Now, where is your theory that under Democratic tariffs the sluice gates were opened so wide that American industry was about to be destroyed by foreign importations when the actual increase in 1914 was only 7.9 per cent and the actual increase in the last year of your tariff law was 7.7 per cent, a difference in percentage of increase of importations between the last year of your law and the first year of our law of only two-tenths of 1 per cent?

More than that, this report says that the percentage increase in general of imports is much less than that for the majority of the years of the past 17 years; and 16 of those 17 years your years, when your increases were greater than the increases that came from a Democratic tariff law; and that was before the 30th day of June, 1914, and before the war in Europe disturbed conditions in any way.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an inquiry right there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. How does the Senator from Alabama account for the fact that during the 8 or 10 months prior to the war in Europe, under this tariff law, there was universal industrial depression in Pennsylvania and all over the eastern part of the country? The Senator certainly can not deny that that was the condition which existed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator was not in the Chamber when I answered that charge.

Mr. PENROSE. No; I was not. I should like to ask the question again of the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated that we inherited industrial depression from your party, but that the country undoubtedly was moving toward better times and better industrial conditions until the war in Europe commenced; and then, due to the fact that it disturbed business conditions all along the line, especially the great banking interests, made uncertain the export trade, and paralyzed the cotton market, that temporarily for a few months during that summer there was a depressed business condition, but that the business condition revived as soon as the country discovered that there was no danger to American business interests from the war in Europe and that the predictions about Democratic legislation had proven untrue. Then we went into the greatest era of prosperity that the country has ever known.

Mr. PENROSE. I am sorry that I was called out of the Chamber when the Senator made his explanation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. President, the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have charged that there has been a tremendous reduction in the duties levied at the customhouse which has endangered American industry. I stated when this bill was written we intended to write a tariff for revenue; that we intended to reduce the taxes at the customhouse in accordance with revenue theory, not in accordance with protective theory; but I also stated at that time that we recognized that established industries had been built up under the Republican theory of a protective tariff and that we did not intend to destroy American industry; that we did not intend to tear down the Republican protective house by cutting out its underpinning with an ax, but that we intended to lower it with a jackscrew, so it would not disturb existing business conditions.

We have lowered it, and we have not disturbed existing business conditions, and the lowering that we made, as shown by these statistics, has not been of that drastic nature that gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber were so fond of declaring and predicting. This is an official report. This is not a guess. This is a statement based on facts.

On page 13, under the heading "Average ad valorem duty under recent tariffs," the report says:

> The average rate of duty on imports under the Underwood-Simmons tariff shows a less marked decrease from the previous rates than is frequently inferred.
> The fairest comparison is undoubtedly from the date when the law became effective to the end of the fiscal year 1914, just one month before the outbreak of the European war. Since the provision admitting wool free of duty did not become effective until December 1, 1913, and the new rates of duty on manufactures of wool did not become effective until January 1, 1914, imports of these articles are included only for the six months, January 1 to June 30. Similarly, imports of sugar and molasses are included only from April 1 to June 30, the first full quarter in which the reduced rates (effective March 1, 1914) were in force. Wool and manufactures of wool are similarly included only for the last two quarters, and sugar and molasses only for the final quarter of the statement covering the nine months ending June 30, 1913.
> By this means returns may be compared with no overlapping of tariffs. Throughout the later period the Underwood-Simmons rates were in force, and throughout the earlier period, October, 1912, to June, 1913, the Payne-Aldrich rates were in force.
> The average rate of duty from October 1, 1912, to June 30, 1913, was 15.5 per cent ad valorem, calculated on total imports, and 37.8 per cent ad valorem, calculated exclusively on dutiable imports. Similarly, the average rate of duty from October 4, 1913, to June 30, 1914, was 12.3 per cent ad valorem calculated on total imports and 34 per cent ad valorem calculated on dutiable imports. In both periods wool and manufactures of wool are included only for the last six months and sugar and molasses only for the last three months. (Table 9.)
> The comparison of the results under the two periods shows that for approximately nine months under the present tariff the average rate of duty was 3.2 per cent ad valorem less than under the former tariff, when the average is calculated on total imports, and 3.8 per cent ad valorem less than under the former tariff, when the average is calculated on dutiable imports.
> An increase or decrease in the level of duties may be compared on two bases: On the value of imports or on the former average duty. Suppose that all articles imported were subject to a uniform rate of duty of 10 per cent ad valorem and a new law was passed substituting a uniform rate of duty of 8 per cent ad valorem. In such a case the reduction might be described either as 2 per cent ad valorem—that is, 2 per cent of the value of the imports—or 20 per cent of the former duty (2 divided by 10).
> The reduction in duty under the present tariff being from 15.5 to 12.3 per cent ad valorem calculated on total imports, means that for the same amount of imports the customs receipts were reduced about 20 per cent of the former duty (3.2 divided by 15.5). Similarly the calculation on dutiable imports alone shows a reduction from 37.8 to 34 per cent ad valorem. These latter figures indicate that the reduction, considering only the goods that remained subject to duty, represented approximately 10 per cent of the former ad valorem duty. The net effects of the law, so far as shown by the nine-month returns, are therefore a considerable increase in the free list, namely, from 59.2 to 63.8 per cent of the total imports, and a reduction averaging 10 per cent in the rates of duty on the articles that remained subject to duty.

In other words, from 37.8 per cent on dutiable imports to 34 per cent.

It is fair to say the estimate made under the Payne law of dutiable imports and the estimate under the present law of dutiable imports do not include all the same articles. It includes all the articles that were taxed when the Payne law was on the statute books and all the articles that are taxed with the present law on the statute books, but it does not include in the calculation for the present law articles that were taken out of the dutiable list and put on the free list under the present law. If that had been included, it would have shown an average reduction of duty under the present law to about 26 and a fraction per cent, between 26 and 27 per cent of the value of dutiable goods imported in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913. Do you contend we have ruined the country by putting certain necessities on the free list? I have not heard a great deal of complaint coming from the other side of the Chamber about our having put boots and shoes on the free list, about our having put steel rails on the free list, about our having put raw wool on the free list.

No; those industries have not been driven out of existence because we put them on the free list. What you have been complaining about is the tax we have left on articles that are still taxed, dutiable articles, and, according to this report, our reduction has been only 10 per cent of the old tax that you had. Is that drastic? Is that destructive of industry? What I stated a while ago from these reports as to these importations coming in as dutiable imports demonstrated conclusively that it was not. The theory advocated by the Republican Party that a Democratic tariff has destroyed American industry is not sustained by the facts; it is not sustained by the reports of the customhouse.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. Would it interrupt the Senator for me to call his attention to the ratio existing between the labor cost and the value of the article imported?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am coming to that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. Then, I will not interrupt the Senator further, because I wanted that the RECORD might show the ratio of labor cost to the total cost of the article itself or the total value of the article itself, the chemical schedule, for instance, having approximately 38 per cent tariff and 8 per cent total labor cost.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I intend before taking my seat to insert those figures in the RECORD and comment upon them.

I do not intend to go into a discussion this afternoon, as I have discussed it heretofore, as to whether the tariff law written by the Democratic Party justified itself as a revenue measure. Some months ago I made a statement that satisfied myself if it did not satisfy others that the tariff law met all existing conditions at the time it was written, and that when you add the income tax it produced more revenue than either the Dingley law or the Payne law during the lifetime of those laws, or more than the Payne law and the corporation tax added together produced. But this report makes a statement on that subject which I desire to call to the attention of the Senate in passing:

> The close correspondence between the estimated receipts and the actual receipts under the Underwood-Simmons tariff is striking. It was estimated that the measure, as it passed the House of Representatives, would produce during its first full year of operation $258,000,000; as it passed the Senate, $248,000,000; and as it was finally enacted, $249,000,000. Since the new rates on sugar and molasses became effective March 1, 1914, the law was in full operation only five months before the outbreak of the European war. This covered only one full quarter, that extending from April 1 to June 30, 1914. During that quarter the duties amounted to $63,000,000, and at this rate the returns for a full year would have been $254,000,000. The receipts, therefore, exceeded by some $5,000,000 the expected proceeds.

In other words, the receipts, as demonstrated by the last quarter when the law was actually in effect and when there was no European war, calculated at that rate for a whole year, produced $5,000,000 more than the Ways and Means Committee predicted it would produce when the bill was passed.

Now, of course, it did not produce as much revenue at the customhouse as the Payne tariff law produced, but it was not intended to do so, because we had inaugurated a new system of taxation. We had said that the great wealth of this country must bear a portion of the burden of taxation. We had levied an income tax. That income tax that year produced something more than $80,000,000. Add the $80,000,000 to the amount produced by the Democratic tariff law and you have a result that exceeds the amount of revenue collected any year under the Payne tariff law at the customhouse, with your corporation tax added. So, for the governmental expenditures that the bill was written to meet, it would have met every condition and more if the European war had not come along to cut off one-third of the imports at the customhouse and, necessarily, one-third of the revenue. In fact, it would have produced a great deal more, because the income tax this year produced $124,000,000 and the law has not been changed. The customs laws have not been changed, and, of course, the first year the income tax did not have a full year to operate. It did not go into effect, a part of it, until March, and a part of the January dividends and bond interest were not taxed. It was a comparatively dull year in which it was operating. But if we should take this year as the basis of the receipts from our income tax and add $124,000,000 to the average receipts under the customs law before the European war came on, you would have $378,000,000—vastly more income than the requirements of the Government at that time. And the law was written to meet those conditions. Of course, now that the Congress—and both sides of the Congress are responsible—has determined to increase the Army and increase the Navy and add to the expenditures of this Government four or five hundred million dollars for military preparedness, a bill written in 1913 could not be expected to take care of the new and increased expenditures.

I wish to call to your attention that there has been very slight increase in importations, but without you allow some imports to come in you can not get revenue, and no matter how much you may talk about the protection of American industries and the American workmen entitled to the last dollar of the American market, you know just as well as I do if you wrote a tariff on that basis you would not get any revenue at all, because when you put your tariff so high that no imports can come in no revenue follows.

This report on page 19 says:

> II. COMPARISON WITH DOMESTIC INDUSTRY.
> 1. GENERAL IMPORTS AND DOMESTIC EXPORTS COMPARED WITH DOMESTIC PRODUCTION.
> The comparatively slight dependence on foreign industries for the supply of the manufactured goods consumed in this country was brought out clearly by the comparison of the production and manufactures, as shown by the latest census report, and the value of imports.
> As compared with the domestic output of manufactures, valued at $20,700,000,000 by the census in 1909, or, after deduction of payments for contract work, at $20,500,000,000; the $449,000,000 worth of manufactures ready for consumption imported in the fiscal year 1914 seems very small.

The production of American industries in the year 1909, and it was greater in 1914, amounted to $20,500,000,000. This Democratic tariff law of which you complain brought into competition with that enormous output of American industries only $449,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, or about 2 per cent. It averaged 2 per cent of importations as compared to 98 per cent of American production and consumption of like goods. Two per cent, forsooth, on which to levy your revenues to support this Government and 98 per cent of American control of American products in American markets. Do you suppose that you can fool the American people into believing that American industry has been endangered by Democratic legislation when those are the facts of record assembled in the statistical bureaus of this Government? The report goes on to say:

> As compared with the domestic output of manufactures, valued at $20,700,000,000 by the census in 1909, or, after deduction of payments for contract work, at $20,500,000,000, the $449,000,000 worth of manufactures ready for consumption imported in the fiscal year 1914 seems very small. Even if the comparison likewise takes account of the imports of partly and wholly manufactured foodstuffs and manufactures for further use in manufacturing, the total can not be brought quite up to the billion-dollar mark.
> The imports of manufactured goods finished and only partly manufactured combined represent, therefore, less than 5 per cent of the output of our domestic factories five years previous, and were more recent statistics available the percentage of imports would appear much smaller. (Table 20.)
> If the comparison is made in respect to individual industries, much the same results are shown. Owing to the differences in classification between the census returns and the statistics of imports, it is not possible to compare production and imports for all lines. Out of the 260 industries specified by the census of manufactures, 121 produced goods that can be compared fairly with the statistics of imports. Twelve of the industries specified by the census had to be combined with others for comparison with the import classes, thus reducing the number of industries shown in Tables 19, 20, 24, and 25 from 121 to 109 and correspondingly decreasing the total number of industries from 260 to 248. These 109 industries are large enough to produce about 69 per cent of the value of the products of all industries. Fifty-one of these industries, representing an output equal to 50 per cent of the product of the 109 specified industries and 34 per cent of the product of all the industries, so completely fill the domestic market that the imports of similar commodities represent less than 2 per cent of the domestic product. Imports represent from 2 to 10 per cent of the value of domestic products in the case of industries, 29 in number, which produce 28 per cent of the output of the specified industries and 19 per cent of the output of all the industries. The industries which meet foreign competition to the extent of 10 to 20 per cent represent 17 per cent of the product of the specified industries and 11 per cent of the product of all industries. Five per cent of the output of the specified industries and 4 per cent of the output of all the industries is produced in the 16 industries which meet competition to the extent of more than 20 per cent. In the case of only 5 of these industries do imports ex-

From the above comparison it appears that 80 industries, producing 78 per cent of the output of all the industries for which comparison can be made, meet foreign competition to the extent of less than 10 per cent. Even if the industries not susceptible of comparison are assumed to fall outside of this group—an assumption that does not correspond with the facts—it is clear that the imports constitute less than 10 per cents of the domestic product in the case of more than one-half of the industries of the whole country measured in value of output.

In other words, you have complained that the Democratic tariff bill was going to flood the American market and destroy American industries, and yet in 78 per cent of the industries of this country the importations of foreign goods as compared with the production of that particular industry amount to less than 10 per cent of the American consumption. Can not the monopolistic spirit of American production consent that the Government of the United States may have 10 per cent of importations on which to levy its taxes in order to produce some revenue to support this Government? Must that monopolistic spirit be fed by the entire 100 per cent? The table on which these figures are based is most interesting, and, without objection, I shall include it as a part of my remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope the Senator from Alabama will insert the table. I regret that I have not been privileged to listen to the Senator during his entire address. I ask the Senator if any of the industries he has singled out are dealing in the manufacture of munitions of war?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Some of them are dealing in munitions of war, but it is a comparatively small amount. The production of the American industries which I have singled out is about $20,000,000,000. Of that production I have excepted from my statement about $3,000,000,000—that is, this document singles them out. Of course, the comparison could not be made further than that, because a great many of the articles come in under general terms in the tariff law, of which the record is not kept.

Mr. GALLINGER. But does it not follow, if the manufacture of munitions of war is included, which we expect will cease before long, that the percentage of importations would be larger as a result?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know how the manufacture of munitions of war could affect importations. It might and probably would affect exportations.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator did not quite understand me. As I understood, the Senator made a comparison between what was consumed in this country and what was imported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that that would make a difference, would it not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the increased amount of munitions of war that are made in this country does not figure in the question of American consumption at all, because, of necessity, I had to go back and take the last census report, which was that of 1909, showing the industries of this country prior to the beginning of the European war. They are necessarily much greater now.

Mr. GALLINGER. That I did not understand, and I simply asked the Senator for information. I shall be very glad to examine the table if he puts it in the RECORD, as I trust he will.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will put the whole table into the RECORD.

The table refered to is as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand the Senator from Alabama, his comparisons were between American consumption of articles produced in America and the consumption of those which were imported into America.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; including foreign productions which were imported into America.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And foreign productions which were imported into America; so that the munitions problem would have practically nothing to do with it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It has not; but, anyway, it is not included in the table, because I had to take the census reports of 1909. Of course, as I have stated, American production would be much greater now. But I am merely making a comparison and going back to 1909, because that report is official, and it is the last official document on the subject.

Now, let me point out a few of the leading industries to show that this Democratic tariff law, even before the European war began, was not destroying American industry. Take carriages, wagons, and other articles of that kind. The value of the products under the census of 1909 was $159,639,035 and the total dutiable imports were $8,900. The percentage of competition in that item of a great industry was less than one-hundredth part of 1 per cent.

Take boots and shoes, an industry that produced in this country in 1909 $485,330,564, and the importations under this law, in which we put most of the boots and shoes on the free list, only amounted to eleven one-hundredths of 1 per cent—vitally destructive of a great American industry. And when the articles go to the free list the importations that come from abroad in competition with this tremendous production amount to eleven one-hundredths of 1 per cent!

Take the iron and steel industry. Listen to this. As to iron and steel, the product of the steel works and rolling mills, the value of the product, according to the census of 1909, was $985,628,297, and the total imports coming into this country under this Democratic tariff law amounted to $7,269,421, or a percentage of seventy-four one-hundredths of 1 per cent. The "drastic competition" which the Democratic tariff has brought up against the American iron and steel industry from imports from abroad—three-fourths of 1 per cent of their total production—is really alarming, yet Senators on the other side of the Chamber are fearful lest a continuation of this theory of writing a tariff for revenue only and of the Democratic Party standing to the principles of the fathers will destroy the great industries of this country!

Of lumber and timber products the American production was $1,123,679,505; total importations, $25,241,133; 2.25 per cent of importations compared to the production of the American industry.

Of woolen goods the total production was $439,964,957; importations, $25,521,464; average importations as compared to American production, 5.81 per cent. This Democratic tariff is about to destroy the entire woolen industry of America, when, as shown by the census reports, compared with the importations at the customhouse, a Democratic tariff has allowed to come into this country but 5.81 per cent, less than 6 per cent of imports, as compared with 94 per cent of American production and consumption. Do you expect to fool the American people into believing that competition of that kind is going to destroy an industry?

Here is another one of the great industries, namely, cotton goods, including small wares. The value of the product of that industry in 1909 amounted to $626,234,744, with $60,918,048 of importations, or 9.73 per cent. It is only fair to say that the larger percentage of imports under the cotton schedule is of the higher-grade fabrics that are not made in this country, and that a comparison of the really competitive fabrics with American production would reduce the percentage about one-half. These are the great American industries. It is possible to pick out some small ones where the percentage of importations will be greater, but I have enumerated the great American industries, and the figures show that under the Democratic tariff law the highest average of imports as compared to the American production in 1909 is under 10 per cent. The American market is absolutely controlled by the American manufacturers to the extent of more than 90 per cent, even in the case of cotton goods; 94 per cent in the case of woolen goods; and 99 per cent in the case of iron and steel manufactures.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator to a recent compilation showing that the total value of primary production in the United States was $45,000,000,000, and the total imports are not more than 5 per cent of that sum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the percentage does not run that high; but I did not have the advantage of having figures later than those for 1909 on which to base my comparisons.

There is another challenge which our Republican adversaries have made to the Democratic Party in connection with this subject, and that is on the question of wages. They informed us that our tariff law, if levied for revenue only—and that is the kind of law we placed on the statute books—would destroy the American workingman. I want to call attention to what this report says in reference to the wage scale. On page 20, under the heading of "Expenditures for wages," it states:

2. EXPENDITURE FOR WAGES.

As a general average, expenditures for wages represent, according to the census of manufactures for 1909, practically 17 per cent of the value of the product after deduction of the amount paid for contract work. If calculated directly from census returns the percentage would be slightly smaller.

The relation of wages to value of product for each industry enumerated by the census is shown by percentages in Tables 21 and 22. From this comparison it appears that in a surprisingly large number of industries in this country the expenditure for wages is low. In the case of industries with an output representing more than one-fifth of the entire production of the country wages constituted less than 5 per cent of the value of the product. In the case of industries contributing another one-fifth of the total output, wages represented from 5 to 15 per cent of the value of the product. In industries contributing still another one-fifth, wages represented from 15 to 20 per cent of the value of the product. Wages in most of the remaining industries represented 20 to 30 per cent of the value of the product, while in the case of only one-twentieth of the entire production did the expenditure for wages exceed 30 per cent. (Table 23.)

Now, I desire to insert in connection with my remarks, if there be no objection, Tables 21, 22, 24, and 25.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the tables referred to by the Senator from Alabama will be printed in the RECORD.

The tables referred to are as follows:

2. EXPENDITURE OR WAGES.

Table 21 shows for each industry the value of the products manufactured in the United States in 1909 and the expenditure for wages in the manufacture of such products, as reported by the census of manufactures. The percentage that the expense for wages was of the total value of the product is also shown. In Table 22, showing this percentage only, the industries are arranged in the order of the size of this percentage.

8. WAGES AND RATES OF DUTY.

Table 24 shows the percentage of expenditures for wages in the calendar year 1909, compared with the average computed ad valorem rates of duty paid on imports during the first nine months of the present tariff; that is, from October 4, 1913, to June 30, 1914. As in previous tables, the comparison is made only between such articles and groups of articles as are sufficiently similar in the census and in the import classifications to justify the comparison.

While the import data on which this table is based are for the above-mentioned nine-months period, the exceptions are made in the case of wool and sugar. The imports of wool and of manufactures of wool are considered for the six months from January to June, 1914, only, and the imports of sugar and molasses for the three months, April, May, and June, 1914.

TABLE 24.—Average rates of duty on imports entered for consumption, Oct. 4, 1913, to June 30, 1914, computed on the ad valorem basis on dutiable and total imports, with per cent wages, were of value of product, calendar year 1909, shown by census of manufactures, for comparable commodities.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In passing I desire to make a few comments on what is shown in Tables 24 and 25. For instance, taking flour-mill and gristmill products, the average rate of duty ad valorem on dutiable imports from October 4, 1913, to June 30, 1914, amounted to 10.61 per cent, and the percentage of wages to the value of the product was 2.43 per cent; in other words, the tariff duty was nearly five times as much as there was labor to protect.

The tin-plate industry affords another good illustration. It was fostered and built up by the Republican Party for many years. The average rate of duty ad valorem for the same period was 15 per cent under the existing law; the average rate of duty on total imports was 14 per cent; while the percentage of wages to the value of the product was only 6.91 per cent.

Coming to the woolen and worsted industry, you have complained that labor is going to be destroyed on account of the Democratic tariff, but the figures show that the average rate of duty under the Democratic tariff law is 31.61 per cent and the average wages paid only 16.67 per cent of the value of the product, amounting to nearly twice as much as the wages paid. Under those circumstances do you expect the American public to believe that a Democratic tariff is destructive of American industry?

But to return to the text of this document. On page 21, under the caption of "Wages and rates of duty," this statement is made:

3. WAGES AND RATES OF DUTY.

It is of special interest to compare the expenditure for wages with the average rate of duty on imports. Differences in classification between the census returns and commercial statistics have made it necessary to limit this comparison to the 109 industries for which the returns are fairly comparable. In the case of industries producing 43 per cent of the output of the 109 specified industries, the percentage of expense for wages is less than the average rate of duty on all imports, and in the case of another 22 per cent, the expense is more than the average rate of duty on all imports of similar products but less than the average rate of duty on dutiable imports. These two classes represent 65 per cent of the value of the product of the specified industries and 45 per cent of the value of the total output of manufactures. (Table 25.)

In the case of industries representing 12 per cent of the output of the specified industries, or 8 per cent of the output of all industries, similar commodities are admitted free of duty, while in the case of 22 per cent of the value produced by the specified industries and 15 per cent of the value of all industries, the expenditure for wages exceeds the average rate of duty on dutiable imports of similar commodities.

There can be little doubt that the industries compared are strictly representative of all industries in the country. The 109 specified industries represent 69 per cent of the total output of manufacturing industries recorded by the census. Moreover, the average expenditure for wages in all industries is 16.72 per cent, while the average expenditure for the 109 industries is 14.39 per cent.

The close correspondence shown brings out clearly the representative character of the comparison of the 109 specified industries.

Which clearly demonstrates that the present rates of duty, except as to those articles which are placed on the free list, far exceed in most instances the percentage of labor cost as compared to the value of the manufactured product.

In passing, I will say that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] called my attention to a statement made by me in a speech at Waterbury, Conn., previous to the election of 1912, to the effect that the tariff would not be reduced below the difference in the labor cost. The fact is that in but few instances has it been reduced below the entire labor cost, and so far as the great industries of this country are concerned it has been reduced much less than the difference in labor cost.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to define the Democratic position in reference to levying a tariff at the customhouse. I have endeavored to review the operation of the present tariff. I think I have demonstrated conclusively from the figures that the tariff taxes that are now on the statute books do not jeopardize American industry and do not threaten American labor, but that they have been written in the interest of bringing about some fair competition, in recognition of the principle that taxes at the customhouse should be levied primarily for the purpose of furnishing the Government with revenue, and in repudiation of the Republican doctrine that they should be levied primarily for the purpose of maintaining a protective tariff to foster and build up special industries.

It was my intention, when I rose to make this statement, to discuss certain features of the pending bill, especially the provision relating to dyestuffs and the provision relating to a tariff commission. But as I have occupied several hours in discussing the questions that I have considered, I prefer to postpone the discussion of those two particular items until the time when they are reached for consideration in the bill; and I hope that at that time I may have an opportunity to express fully and fairly my views on those particular items.

I differ with the committee in reference to the writing of those two particular items, and will express my reasons for differing with them when the time comes. I wish to say, however, that in the main I concur in the action of the committee in writing this bill. The great burden of taxation carried by this bill has been distributed to the wealth of this country. It has not been distributed by taxes on consumption, where the burden would have fallen on the mass of the American people.

The necessity for this legislation grows out of the fact that the Congress has very largely increased the cost of maintaining an Army and a Navy. The increase of the Army and Navy has come from a demand from the representatives of wealth in this country. They are entitled to that protection. They demand that protection. They will largely get the benefit of that protection, and it is but just that they should pay for that protection.

So, in regard to the main features of the bill, I agree with the committee, and cheerfully support the result of their labors. As I say, there are one or two items in regard to which I am compelled to differ with them on what I regard as matters of principle, and I will express my views on those questions when the items are reached for consideration in the bill.

Before taking my seat I ask you not to forget that many of our great industries are producing a greater product than the home market can consume; these surplus products must be sold in foreign countries or the volume of output must be reduced, unless we continue to sell abroad there will be some reduction in output and a corresponding reduction in the employment of labor. You can not sell abroad with profit unless you receive payment for your goods. We have already drained the world of its gold. How can you get your pay for your export goods? How can you enlarge or even continue your export trade unless you are willing to allow some foreign goods to come into this country? You say you will allow only noncompetitive articles to enter. You know as well as I do that we have already exhausted that field; that our demand for noncompetitive articles will not begin to equalize the trade balance created by our export trade, and unless you allow some competitive articles to enter our country you must curtail our sales abroad. To live and let live is the golden rule of humanity the world over; in the wars of commerce the same rule applies as on the field of actual combat, where the weight of artillery and battleships decide the fate of nations; destruction of your adversary or your competitor in the end will spell destruction of yourself. Let us play the game of commerce fairly and we will play it well for ourselves. Let us understand that life, health, and opportunity that comes to the common men and women through fair dealing and fair trade is more vital to the life of this Nation than all the special privileges you can grant at the customhouses to make a few men very rich. Let us remain true to our principles, whether we win or lose, for in the true faith of our fathers is found the preservation of the freedom, the liberty, and the prosperity of the American people.

Mr. PENROSE obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have listened with great interest to a portion of the speech just made by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the author of the tariff bill that is now on the statute books. An hour ago I was looking over the platforms of the parties, particularly the platform of the Democratic Party of 1912, where the Republican Party were denounced as being extravagant and as having brought a great deal of suffering to the American people because of their legislation, and I discovered in that platform a pledge of the Democratic Party that if they were placed in power they would reduce the cost of living to the American people.

I have in my hand a newspaper, the Washington Times, printed about one hour ago, and my attention has been directed to this headline:

Cost of living soars 25 per cent in the year. Price of canned goods and beans doubled. Flour continues to rise. A 50 per cent boost in coal is slated at Chicago.

It seems, Mr. President, that the Democratic Party have failed conspicuously to carry out the promise in their platform in reference to the cost of living, and I think it will be made to appear before this discussion closes what the reasons are for the greatly increased price to the consuming public. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire can imagine the answer which will be given to him. The war in Europe covers every sin of omission and commission of the Democratic Party in the last two years and a half. If it had not been for the war in Europe, the party would hardly be running a candidate for President this fall.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Pennsylvania begins his speech, will he yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. On yesterday the Senator expressed the desire that I should obtain from the Treasury Department a detailed statement of the amount of total appropriations for 1917 as compared with 1916 and also an itemized statement of the estimated disbursements from the general fund for the year 1917. I have here, sent to me this morning, a statement of date of August 18 showing the total amount of appropriations.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have it printed.

Mr. SIMMONS. The total amount is $1,572,008,718, leaving out the shipping bill and the nitrate plant, these omissions are referred in the note to statement.

Mr. PENROSE. On what ground are they left out?

Mr. SIMMONS. Because that is not an appropriation.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, certainly, Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a matter of argument whether they should be included or not. I do not want to enter into any argument now about that. We discussed that at length yesterday.

Mr. PENROSE. That is the McAdoo system of bookkeeping, which would land a bank cashier in jail.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator can discuss the question of bookkeeping as much as he pleases. The Senator can discuss the question of whether the purchase of these ships with bonds is a legitimate current expense of the Government or not. I do not desire now to enter into that discussion, because we went over it yesterday. I am simply complying at this time with the request of the Senator to file a detailed statement of the Treasury Department.

I also file a detailed statement of the Treasury Department embracing the estimated disbursements for the fiscal year 1917, showing the estimated disbursements of the fiscal year 1917 to be $1,126,243,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the statements will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 23, 1916.

Mr. PENROSE. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator in getting this detailed information. I will examine it carefully. I am not so much interested in estimated disbursements as in actualities—what is really going to be received and disbursed. I am having some figures compiled which disclose a startling difference between the actual condition of the Treasury and its condition as represented by Mr. McAdoo and Mr. KITCHIN and the chairman of the Committee on Finance here in the Senate; and these figures will be illuminating to me, I have no doubt, in perfecting those figures to present to the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me for a minute——

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on yesterday gave two estimates of expenditure for 1917, one of $1,630,000,000. This estimate included $50,000,000 carried in the shipping bill and to be paid by sale of bonds. He also gave an estimate of $1,700,000,000, including not only the $50,000,000 for the shipping bill but $25,000,000 for the purchase of the Danish islands and $50,000,000 for the flood-control bill, neither of which amounts have yet been appropriated. If you will subtract the $50,000,000 which he includes for the shipping bill, the $20,000,000 for the nitrate plant, the $25,000,000 he includes for the Danish islands, and the $50,000,000 that he includes for flood control, you will see that his total would be $1,555,000,000, or considerably less than the amount estimated by the Treasury Department.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, does the Senator from North Carolina deny that it is the intention of his party to pass the flood-control bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is my impression that the flood-control bill will not pass at this session of Congress.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no; but during the life of the present Congress?

Mr. SIMMONS. At this session of Congress, I say, it is my understanding that the flood-control bill will not pass.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator whether he denies that it is the intention of the Democratic majority to pass the flood-control bill prior to the 4th of March, 1917?

Mr. SIMMONS. They may pass it during the next Congress, but that will not go in the appropriations for the present fiscal year—the fiscal year 1917.

Mr. PENROSE. Some of it will.

Mr. SIMMONS. That will be an appropriation for the fiscal year 1918.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I was called out of the Chamber just a moment to see a party, and I did not hear what the Senator from North Carolina had to say with relation to the amount of appropriations that I claimed had been made and would be made at this session of Congress. I will look at the RECORD to-morrow, Mr. President; but I will say now that the amounts of the appropriations that I gave yesterday were the actual appropriations, with the exception of the deficiency bill and the miscellaneous appropriations that are yet to be definitely decided. But, as I stated yesterday, the estimates that I have made are within the limits of what the appropriations will be. There is no question at all about that.

I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina further that it is a strange position for him to take to claim that an appropriation of $50,000,000 for the purchase of ships to be paid for through the sale of Government bonds is not an appropriation. The money necessary to pay for the ships will be secured by the sale of bonds, which is exactly the same as an individual borrowing money to meet an individual obligation. The money secured from the bond sale goes into the Treasury of the United States and will be paid out of the Treasury whenever the ships are purchased. There is not a particle of difference in principle between a transaction of that kind than the payment of money that is collected from the customs receipts and paid out for anything else for which an appropriation is made by Congress.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PENROSE. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator made two statements with reference to appropriations. One estimate is that the appropriations would amount to $1,630,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. And I say so yet, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator included in that $50,000,000 of bonds for the purchase of ships.

Mr. SMOOT. I included in that an appropriation for $50,000,000 for the purchase of ships.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. Then the Senator made another estimate of $1,700,000,000, and the Senator included in that estimate $25,000,000 for the Danish Islands and $50,000,000 for flood control.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not make such an estimate. I simply said, referring to the statement that was made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that if we paid $25,000,000 for the Danish Islands, and if the flood-control bill was passed, then, with the other appropriations that were made and would be made, the amount would be over $1,700,000,000. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. SIMMONS. So it amounts to this: If we purchase the Danish Islands for $25,000,000, and if we appropriate $50,000,000 for flood control, those two sums added to the $50,000,000 for the purchase of ships and the $20,000,000 for the nitrate plant would make $145,000,000. Now, my statement is that if you subtract those sums, two being provided for already according to law by the issuance of Panama Canal bonds, the other two measures not having been passed by the Senate, and one of them not having been passed by either branch of Congress—

if you deduct that $145,000,000 from the Senator's total estimate of $1,700,000,000, it would leave $1,555,000,000. If you deduct the $50,000,000 for the purchase of ships from his estimate of $1,630,000,000, then you would have a total appropriation of $1,580,000,000. So that there is not much difference between the figures presented by the Senator and those presented by myself, except that in one case the Senator exempts the $50,000,000 for ships, and in the other case he exempts the $50,000,000 for ships, $20,000,000 for nitrate plant, $25,000,000 for the Danish Islands, and $50,000,000 for flood control. That is the only practical and substantial difference between us.

Mr. President, the question here is as to the amount appropriated for current expenses of the Government. The opposition says that the Democratic Party in Congress has been extravagant in its appropriations for the current expenses of the Government. I say that the current expenses of the Government are $1,572,000,000, according to the Treasury Department's statement. The ships that we are going to buy, the Danish Islands, if we buy them, will neither be a part of the current expenses. They will be purchases, but not a part of the current expenses.

If the question is, What are the current expenses of running my farm? I am not required to add to those current expenses the purchase of another farm, and that is the Senator's proposition here. His proposition is, if we go out and purchase Cuba, or purchase some other island of the seas, in addition to the Danish Islands, every time we purchase an island we must add the price we pay for it to the current expenses of the Government. I say that is a mere investment. It has nothing to do with the question of the current expenses of the Government, and it is not a question of extravagance. It is a question of policy. It is a question of whether it is good policy to buy those islands. It is a question of whether it is good policy to build these ships. The amount appropriated for the construction of the ships being only the actual amount that will be expended, and the amount appropriated for the purchase of the islands being only the price paid, it is not a matter of extravagance; it is a matter of policy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no difference between the Government of the United States purchasing a battleship and purchasing $50,000,000 worth of auxiliary ships, as the ship-purchase bill is supposed to provide. The money for both will come out of the Treasury of the United States. The appropriation for the purchase of ships has been made in the same way as the appropriation of $313,000,000 was made for the Navy.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator contend that the purchase of the Danish Islands for $25,000,000 is a part of the current expenses?

Mr. SMOOT. The Danish Islands are worrying the Senator. I will read to the Senator what I said in relation to the Danish Islands; and the only reason that I referred to the Danish Islands was because if they were purchased the total would exceed the amount of appropriations of this Congress that I had stated to the Senate. This is what I said yesterday:

> Deducting the amount of appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 of $257,696,277.65 from the appropriations for this year shows an increased appropriation of $348,948,398.29. Added to that should be the amount that will be appropriated in the deficiency bills for preparedness. I will grant that there will be $40,000,000 or $42,000,000 additional appropriations made and to be made, which will make in round numbers for preparedness $390,000,000.
> Mr. President, the appropriations for this fiscal year, estimating that the deficiencies will amount to $72,500,000, or that the general deficiency bill will carry not to exceed $20,000,000—I think it will be more than that—and estimating the amount for miscellaneous purposes at $85,000,000, which includes, of course, the $50,000,000 for the ship-purchase bill, the total appropriation bills that we know will pass will carry $1,630,383,682.64.

And I defy the Senator to say that that is not true.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has defied me to say that it is not true. I suggested that, leaving out the shipping bill and nitrate plant, the appropriations would be $1,572,000,000. Now, if you include it—and you do include it and the nitrate plant—there is not much difference between the Senator's figures and mine.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well, Mr. President, even with the $50,000,000 out it would be $1,580,000,000, with further appropriations coming.

Mr. SIMMONS. My estimate was $1,572,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I will now proceed, if the Senator will permit. What I just read referred to actual appropriations, but I did follow it with this statement, calling attention to the fact that even with this enormous amount of appropriations there was a likelihood of its being increased beyond that amount, and I said:

> The $25,000,000 for the Danish Islands, the $50,000,000 for the flood-control bill, if passed, and other bills to which I could call the attention of the Senate, would run the amount far over the $1,700,000,000.

Mr. President, I did not say that the bills would pass. I did not make any argument upon the assumption that they would pass. I simply said that over and above the amount I had named that I was positive the appropriation bills would amount to, there was a likelihood of these two measures passing. So, if they do not pass, they will not be added. If they do, they will be added to the amount that I named.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I have said is that if the $50,000,000 for the shipping bill, the $20,000,000 for the nitrate plant, the $25,000,000 for the Danish Islands, and the $50,000,000 for the flood-control bill—neither of the last two having become law—are taken from the Senator's estimate of $1,700,000,000, it will leave not quite the same but just about the same as the Treasury estimate—$1,572,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing for the Senator to take out the flood-control bill and the Danish Islands purchase bill, because I have never added them, but I do object to taking out the $50,000,000 that we have already appropriated for the purchase of ships. The appropriation for that purpose is just the same as any other appropriation that has ever been made by Congress, whether at this session or at any other.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PENROSE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator from Utah think it was rather cruel for the Senator from North Carolina to compel us to debate that bill for a week, pointing out the extravagance of appropriating $50,000,000 for that purpose which we thought was useless, and now to come in and say it ought not to be included in the appropriations? It seems to me rather absurd.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say it is not part of the current expenses of the Government, and therefore not properly included in appropriations for current expenses. It is an investment, and the question with relation to that and the only question is the question whether that was a matter of good policy or not. It is not a question of extravagance.

Mr. SMOOT. The position taken by the Senator would be perfectly correct if the Government of the United States did not have to redeem its bonds; but the Government of the United States, if it issues a bond, has to redeem it at some time or other. In order to pay the bonds, the money must be taken from the Treasury of the United States; and in order to get the money into the Treasury of the United States, to pay the appropriation for the purchase of ships, the party in power has decided that they will sell Government bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the ships are continued in Government possession they will be an asset equal to the amount paid; and if they are sold that they will be an asset equal to the amount they sell for. It is an investment; whether good or bad, the future must determine.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that if $50,000,000 worth of ships are purchased and are sold by the Government of the United States after the close of the war the Government will not get $20,000,000 for them. I want to make that prediction right now. If the Government gets $20,000,000 for the $50,000,000 it pays for the ships it will do very well, and better than it did at the time it purchased ships during the Spanish-American War.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when we were discussing the shipping bill we heard from that side constantly the statement that private capital was so eager to get ships that it had all the shipyards of the country busy building ships.

Mr. SMOOT. It has.

Mr. SIMMONS. And it cost private capital as much to build as it costs the Government to build. Now, if the Senator is right in the statement that these ships will not be worth 50 cents on the dollar, will he please explain why private capital is so eager to invest money in the construction of ships to be used as these Government ships will be used? If it is such a reckless venture for the Government, why is private capital investing to the extent claimed?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, it is so simple that it seems to me the Senator should hesitate to ask the question. To-day private ships are making in some cases almost the cost of the ship in one round trip across the Atlantic. The Government of the United States can not do that, for she can not get her ships built for two years, if within that time.

Mr. SIMMONS. It can get them built as well as private capital can get them built.

Mr. SMOOT. Private parties have their ships already in operation. If the Government of the United States goes into the market and tries to purchase ships to-day she will no doubt pay $160 a gross ton for them, whereas ordinarily the price is not to exceed $40 to $50 a gross ton. Not only that, I want to say to the Senator that the same thing will be repeated which was brought home to us so forcibly when the Government of the United States bought ships for the Spanish-American War and did not get 20 cents on the dollar for them.

Mr. LANE. That was under a Republican administration.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and I am perfectly willing to admit that they got more than they would if it had been under a Democratic administration. There is no doubt that we got more for those ships than we would have obtained if the Democrats had been in power.

But private capital that is in the shipping business to-day intends to continue in the shipping business. The shipping bill provides that at the end of five years the Government of the United States is to go out of the business.

Mr. SIMMONS. After the war.

Mr. SMOOT. After the war, but not to exceed five years; and, of course, the war is not going to last for five years, but if it is only two years, so much the worse for the Government of the United States, the greater will be the loss.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me it is perfectly absurd to try to make the country believe that the appropriation of $50,000,000 for the purchase of ships is not an appropriation during this session of Congress.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, a resolution which I introduced yesterday is on the table proposing to recommit the pending bill with instructions. I should like to have it read, and I desire to address myself to the resolution and the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the Senator calling up the resolution for action?

Mr. PENROSE. Either this afternoon or to-morrow. I think it would be a good resolution to vote on.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are ready to vote on it now.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have it read and to make a few observations on its merits.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that. I thought the Senator was calling it up for immediate action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 253, submitted yesterday by Mr. PENROSE, as follows:

Resolved, That H. R. 16763 be recommitted to the Committee on Finance with instructions to amend the bill so as to raise an equitable portion of the required revenue from a protective tariff, "sufficient to protect adequately American industry and American labor, and to be so adjusted as to prevent undue exactions by monopolies or trusts"; and

With further instructions to the Committee on Finance to give special attention to securing the industrial independence of the United States, to the end that "our industries can be so organized that they will become not only a commercial bulwark but a powerful aid to national defense"; and

That the bill be further amended so as to require the tariff commission to report the difference in wages and the cost of production between foreign countries and the United States.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the language of the resolution is largely taken from the platform of the Republican Party declared at Chicago last June and is an answer to those who state that the Republicans in this Chamber have no proposition to make looking toward ways and means to increase the revenue. If the pending measure can be recommitted to the Committee on Finance and adequate time allowed for the consideration of proper protective duties, the majority will find the cordial cooperation of the minority to bring about a result as indicated in the resolution.

Mr. President, there are many objections to the present bill entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," concerning which I shall speak later, but the radical objection to the measure is that it presents a cumbersome and illogical system of direct taxes without first having resort to an effort to obtain necessary revenues for the Government by duties upon imports. The Constitution of the United States conferred upon Congress the exclusive right to levy duties upon imports and withheld from it all power to raise revenue by direct taxation, save according to a rule which the conditions of modern times have rendered impracticable. Congress was given the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises were required to be uniform throughout the United States.

It was further provided that no tax or duty should be laid on articles exported from any State; and, further, that no preference should be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor should vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

Above all, the Constitution originally provided that Representatives and direct taxes should be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers.

The right to levy a direct tax has in the history of the Government been exercised only upon a few occasions until quite recently, and all direct taxes were surrendered to the use of the States, which it is assumed require objects of taxation for their growing needs and are able to collect them upon a practical basis.

Within recent years, as is well known, the sixteenth amendment was adopted, providing that—

Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration.

This amendment doubtless was necessary to provide for the increasing needs of the Government, and, at any rate, as the amendment has been adopted, there is no occasion for discussing the question now. The fact, however, seems to stand out conspicuously that it was the evident intention of the framers of our Government, and that intention is clearly set forth in the several paragraphs of the Constitution to which I have referred that the revenues of the Government necessary to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States should be collected by duties, excises, and imposts.

Moreover, the larger part of the revenues of the Government has actually been collected from such duties and imposts throughout its history, together with an excise tax upon certain articles of luxury and consumption; and, further, the great and speedily growing States of the Union have been left largely undisturbed in the power of levying direct taxes for their rapidly expanding needs.

The States of the Union and the large municipalities therein all require large revenues for purposes not thought of a few years ago. Our municipalities are nearly all heavily in debt, and are in most cases restricted to a limited field of taxation. The municipal needs, however, are ever enlarging in a constantly increasing ratio without any prospect of relief from debt or the securing of revenue to meet the demands necessary for projects in the interest of the health and well-being of the citizens. The States themselves and the cities therein are called upon to maintain elaborate boards of health, systems of sewage disposal, continually increasing requirements of educational and eleemosynary institutions, and, over and above all, to cite one instance of development to an extraordinary degree of magnitude in the last few years, the imperative demand for good roads has caused an expenditure running into a staggering amount of money in the aggregate from one end of the country to the other.

Now the States are expressly excluded by the Constitution from levying duties or imposts, and are obliged to resort to the various well-known forms of State taxation of a direct character. The Federal Government, under the doctrines recently advanced that no taxes should be imposed upon articles of consumption and, apparently, that as little revenue as possible should be collected from imports, encroaches upon the field of direct taxation belonging to the States and abandons a source of revenue from the customhouse, to which the Government has the exclusive right. This seems to me illogical in principle and unfair in practice. The ultimate effect necessarily following is that the State revenues will greatly be limited, if not impoverished, and the outlook for many of our municipalities from a financial point of view is not very hopeful.

The wrongful and injurious tendency of appealing to the Federal Government for appropriations for projects which should be of State concern will become stronger every year. We have had an illustration of this tendency at this session, in the bill recently approved making an appropriation of $85,000,000 to aid the States in road construction. From a practical point of view I am not prepared to say that this bill was undesirable. I do assert, however, that it is a radical departure from our traditions, and is only excusable on the ground that the Federal Government is gradually absorbing all the available objects of direct taxes. But, regardless of the merits of the road legislation, the fact remains that it is doubtless only the beginning of other propositions looking to Federal aid for objects and purposes which should be of State concern and which until a few years ago no one would ever have dreamed of bringing to the attention of the Congress.

A consideration of these facts, briefly stated, seems to me to lead inevitably to the conclusion that Congress ought first to provide for the revenues of the Government by imposts and duties and the usual excise taxes, and that direct taxes should be levied secondly and to the amount required for the actual needs of the Government.

Reflection upon the argument here set forth will cause the admission that the strongest opponent of the income tax never made objection to it in theory or in event the Government really needed the revenue from an income tax in case of war.

The revenue bill under discussion contains a striking instance of the ill-advised and unfair encroachment of the Federal Government in levying direct taxes upon an object which has been for many years the established practice of many of the States of the Union to rely on for a considerable part of their revenues. Thirty States have laws imposing inheritance or share taxes both upon direct and collateral heirs; 12 other States have laws imposing inheritance taxes upon collateral heirs. Now the Federal Government steps in and attempts to collect its share of tribute by a Federal tax upon inheritances.

The total inheritance-tax receipts of the 42 States having inheritance taxes amounted in 1913 to $26,470,964 and in 1915 to $28,217,735.

It is difficult for me to conceive of any reasonable argument which justifies the Government of the United States in interfering with the States in this particular source of revenue. The inheritance tax is peculiar in character; and while it may be theoretically fair it certainly has never been popular. Burdens are thereby added, when if such additional burdens were necessary the States should have been left with the right of making their own increases.

It is argued that the inheritance-tax laws of the various States never have been a source of large revenue. This argument seems to be based on the fact that the amount collected is small compared to the receipts from "death duties" or inheritance taxes collected by Great Britain, which amounted in 1914 to $132,000,000. If this is the only argument, I sincerely trust that it will never be met by an increase of taxation comparable to that now collected by Great Britain in the crisis of the greatest war in her history. It is estimated that when the law is in complete and normal operation it will yield $54,000,000 annually and that for the year ending June 30, 1917, the revenue from this source is estimated at $17,000,000.

I make the statement that the intention of the Constitution and the very nature of the federation of States is that the Government should primarily resort to the customs for revenues.

I shall not make a general argument at this time as to whether such revenues should be levied with a view to the protection of American industry, as in the McKinley, Dingley, and Payne laws, or whether these revenues should be collected by duties based upon a low ad valorem rate systematically and uniformly applied solely for purposes of revenue. It is needless for me to say that I belong to the school of protection, and even in this day of novel propositions in finance and taxation I do not waver in my support of the doctrine or belief that it is now more necessary than ever to the welfare of the country. I intend, however, to confine myself, as far as possible, to a discussion of the objections to the pending measure, and shall not run the risk of making myself tedious or diverting attention from the issues before the Senate by making a tariff argument, as much as I would like to. I am content to abide in the school of political economy of which Alexander Hamilton was the original and greatest exponent, which Henry Clay defended with masterly eloquence, and which has been sustained by Republican statesmen down to the present day.

There have been many arguments urged in behalf of the protective system to encourage diversified industries or to protect the home market or to protect the wage standard of the American laborer, but there is one argument that I feel at liberty to refer to and discuss at the present time as being one of immediate concern and involving our very near future. I refer to the necessity of industrial preparedness for the United States in the expectation of the ending of the war in Europe. This question of industrial preparedness has received definite recognition in the pending bill in the provision relative to dyestuffs. This concession, made by those who abhor imposts and duties and tend to the thought that nearly all the expenses of the Government so far as possible should be raised by taxes on incomes and other direct taxes, seems to me to constitute a surrender which gives up their whole case.

If dyestuffs require a protective duty and if they are essential to our industrial independence, because the manufacture of cotton, woolen, and other fabrics, and many other products of the arts and sciences would cease in this country unless we have dyestuffs, I conclude that the same argument can be applied all along the line, and that we have a right to demand a similar protective duty upon every article which we do not manufacture in sufficient quantities ourselves so that we will be industrially independent when the European war closes, and will continue to be independent industrially should any war happen in the future. There are many other things which we need to the same extent, and dyestuffs for silk, cotton, wool, paint, and wall paper do not cover all American requirements.

According to the report of the House committee, when the European war began there were in the United States six factories, employing about 400 operatives, manufacturing coal-tar colors to the extent of 3,300 short tons annually. Imports from Europe amounted to 25,700 short tons annually, thus making an annual consumption of about 29,000 short tons, valued at between $10,000,000 and $12,000,000. Of this quantity about 22,000 short tons came from Germany. After an existence of about 37 years the American coal-tar dyestuff supply prior to the European war was confined practically to the assembling of semimanufactured products termed intermediates and the making of a very limited number of colors. At the present time our production of coal-tar dyes is very inadequate. In this respect, as in many others, the chemical schedule had failed to receive adequate attention even in protection bills, with the result that we subsequently discovered that we were almost entirely dependent upon Germany for the essential articles of dyestuffs. A tax is therefore proposed in the pending bill which is declared to be of a protective nature, calculated to invite American investment. However, the provisions relating to the tax and the rates fixed are so inadequate and deceptive that no investment is likely to be made should this provision become a law.

I shall discuss the dyestuff paragraph when I speak upon the details of the bill. It is sufficient now to say that, regardless of the ineffective character of the paragraph as a protectionist measure, the fact that it is in the bill constitutes a complete admission that we must be industrially independent, at least with respect to dyestuffs; and since I do not think that the American civilization depends entirely and exclusively on dyestuffs, I follow the argument further and say that we should have protective duties that will maintain diversified industries and protect the home market and insure ample wages and a high scale of living to American workmen, and over and above all else shall make us industrially independent in everything hereafter of all the nations in Europe.

The fact of the matter is that it was the purpose to become independent for military and naval munitions which first inspired the idea of protection and prompted the House of Representatives, in 1790, to address a communication to Alexander Hamilton, the Secretary of the Treasury, relating to manufactures in general, and particularly to the means of promoting such as would tend to render the United States independent of foreign nations for military and other essential supplies.

Hamilton never displayed his fertile genius to a greater advantage than in his reply to Congress in response to this communication, in which he presented an argument in favor of protection of the most comprehensive character, and hardly surpassed even by the light which has been thrown upon the subject by the great development of modern industry since his day.

In fact, Mr. President, without going into, as I have said, a tariff discussion, I may be permitted to urge the necessity of industrial preparedness as a paramount reason, outside of the argument which I made in the beginning of my remarks, as to why Congress should at this time have made an effort to secure as much revenue as possible by duties upon imports, together with an adequate antidumping clause, so that we may be prepared for the invasion of importations which everyone confidently looks for as the war in Europe draws to a close.

In this particular the bill apparently gives absolutely no consideration to this issue, which, in my opinion, is to-day uppermost in the minds of the American people.

I will refer, in leaving this general consideration of the subject, to a few extracts from the remarkable speeches of Henry Clay in the House of Representatives and in the Senate. In his speech in the House of Representatives he says:

> Every nation should anxiously endeavor to establish its absolute independence, and, consequently, be able to feed, clothe, and defend itself. If it rely upon a foreign supply, that may be cut off by the caprice of the nation yielding it, by war with it, or even by war with other nations, it can not be independent.

I further quote from another speech in the House—and Clay's words are remarkably appropriate to the present situation—as follows:

> Need I recall to our painful recollection the sufferings for the want of an adequate supply of absolute necessaries to which the defenders of their country's rights and our entire population were subjected during the late war? Or to remind the committee of the great advantage of a steady and unfailing source of supply, unaffected alike in war and in peace?

He was referring in these speeches to the necessity of a protective tariff.

And, again, he describes conditions of prosperity due to the war in Europe, which seem to be almost identical with the conditions of temporary and apparent prosperity which prevail now as the result of the war in Europe, when he says:

Let us suppose, Mr. Chairman, that Europe was again the theater of such a general war as recently raged throughout all her dominions—such a state of the war as existed in her greatest exertions and in our greatest prosperity—instantly there would arise a greedy demand for the surplus produce of our industry, for our commerce, for our navigation. The languor which now prevails in our cities and in our seaports would give way to an animated activity. Our roads and rivers would be crowded with the produce of the interior. Everywhere we should witness excited industry. The precious metals would reflow from abroad upon us. Banks which have maintained their credit would revive their business and new banks would be established to take the place of those which have sunk beneath the general pressure.

And, finally, in his speech in the Senate he makes this remarkable statement:

We have enjoyed near 20 years of peace, but who can tell when the storm of war shall again break forth? Have we forgotten so soon the privations to which not merely our brave soldiers and our gallant tars were subjected, but the whole community, during the last war for the want of absolute necessaries? To what an enormous price they rose. And how inadequate the supply was, at any price. The statesman who justly elevates his views will look behind as well as forward and at the existing state of things, and he will graduate the policy which he recommends to all the probable exigencies which may arise in the Republic.

The fact of the situation is, Mr. President, that history at the present time is repeating itself. It has been frequently asserted, and it is true, that the present apparent and unhealthy prosperity in this country, so far as there is prosperity, is due entirely to the war in Europe.

The tariff bill of the present administration failed to produce revenue and was suddenly bringing about a condition of industrial depression and the menace of industrial disaster before the present European war occurred. The threat to hang employers "as high as Haman" and the declaration that hard times were the result of a psychological condition did not in any way relieve the situation. In the opinion of nearly everybody conversant with financial and industrial conditions, we were rapidly approaching a condition of industrial paralysis even greater than that which it is well known existed under Cleveland's second administration as the result of the operation of the Wilson-Gorman law. Many persons, entitled to speak with authority, declared that we were approaching conditions which were likely to be worse than any in the history of the country. It is not a theory with me, because I actually witnessed the scenes in a very thorough tour which I took through every county of Pennsylvania during 1914. The war in Europe was the salvation of the situation, as far as the Democratic Party was concerned. Of course, the relief can only be temporary. Many persons predict a still worse outcome as the war in Europe draws to a close, unless we are industrially prepared by an adequate protective tariff, including an antidumping clause that is effective. When the military and naval warfare is over the industrial warfare will begin in grim earnest. Such has been the state of affairs upon several occasions in the history of our country.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to read a little paragraph of an editorial in this morning's Washington Post.

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will read the last part of it. Speaking of the United States Steel Corporation, it says:

As against the net earnings for 1909, amounting to more than $131,000,000, the net earnings of 1916 are estimated at $312,000,000. There could be no better evidence of the firm foundation on which the prosperity of the country rests. The United States Steel Corporation is not engaged in manufacturing munitions of war. Its business responds to the demand for railroad extensions, the construction of steel bridges, and the need for new buildings. The enormous prosperity of the company is an indication that the country is forging ahead steadily, with abundant prosperity in sight.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, I do not want to brand that argument with an epithet which occurs to me as an expression of my real opinion, because it might perhaps hurt the Senator's feelings and I might afterwards regret it, but there is nothing in it. Of course, the United States Steel Corporation and every other steel concern in the United States is making money now. I have made a labored effort for the last 10 minutes to recite that fact. That does not contradict the fact, however, that within a few months of the opening of the war in Europe the United States Steel Corporation was about to suspend all dividend payments of every kind. The Baldwin Locomotive Works, in Philadelphia, is to-day employing 30,000 or 40,000 men and extending its works 15 miles below the city, yet before the war in Europe, under the operation of the Underwood tariff law, so called, instead of 30,000 men there were not 3,000 men being employed by that company. I think that there ought to be some appreciation on the other side of the fact that the war in Europe is being worked overtime, and I say, without any exaggeration, that if it had not been for the war in Europe the Democratic Party would not be running a candidate for President this year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator concedes that the United States Steel Corporation does not manufacture munitions of war, does he not?

Mr. PENROSE. No; they do not make any munitions.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And does not the Senator concede that nearly all of the products that are put forth by that corporation are used in the general upbuilding of enterprises and industries in connection with railroad extension and the erection of buildings throughout the United States?

Mr. PENROSE. I have no doubt that part of their product goes into the manufacture of munitions, but they have no contracts, as I understand, with belligerent nations. However, every company that makes munitions must buy from the United States Steel Corporation or some similar concern some of the component parts of the articles it manufactures.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has not the Senator noticed that the railroads throughout the entire United States are ordering enormous quantities of steel rails and have been ordering them for the past eight months or a year, and does not the Senator think that these great orders for steel rails indicate that there is a demand from the railroads to utilize them; and that that means unquestionably that they are supported by the communities through which they run?

Mr. PENROSE. The railroads have been placing a few orders for equipment, but not to any extraordinary extent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I noticed in the paper that the steel corporation was 9,000,000 tons behind in its orders.

Mr. PENROSE. That may be.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is an enormous quantity.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, I hope the Senator will get all the consolation he can out of the meretricious prosperity which comes from the war in Europe. It will be a transient dream, and the awakening will be rude.

Mr. President, I shall make another passing reference to Clay, and mention the fact that in his speech on protection of home industry, delivered in the House of Representatives in 1820, he bewailed the fact that we had no consistent protective policy and that we only had prosperity when there was a war in the continent of Europe. He said:

First there came the embargo; and then nonintercourse and other restrictive measures followed; and then finally that greatest of all stimuli to domestic fabrication, war. During all that long period we were adding to the positive effect of the measures of Government all the moral encouragement which results from popular resolves, legislative resolves, and other manifestations of the public will and the public wish to foster our home manufactures, and to render our confederacy independent of foreign powers. The peace ensued, and the country was flooded with the fabrics of other countries; and we, forgetting all our promises, cooly and philosophically talk of leaving things to themselves; making up our deficiency of practical good sense by the stores of learning which we collect from theoretical writers. I, too, sometimes amuse myself with the visions of these writers (as I do with those of metaphysicians and novelists), and, if I do not forget, one of the best among them enjoins it upon a country to protect its industry against the injurious influence of the prohibitions and restrictions of foreign countries which operate upon it.

And finally he said—and this is my doctrine, Mr. President, and that of everyone who is a patriotic lover of his country, in my opinion, at the present day—

The entire independence of my country on all foreign States, as it respects a supply of our essential wants, has ever been with me a favorite object. The war of our revolution effected our political emancipation. The last war contributed greatly toward accomplishing our commercial freedom. But our complete independence will only be consummated after the policy of this bill shall be recognized and adopted.

Thus the wars which convulsed Europe, with the accompanying embargoes, blockades, and restrictions of trade and importations, temporarily promoted the prosperity of this country and started our American merchant marine upon a development which in time brought it to rank next to that of England, and even to surpass it. Our supremacy on the seas was only destroyed during our Civil War. But, as the speeches of Clay continually declare, this prosperity was of an evanescent character, and with peace in Europe American industry and prosperity languished, unless aided by a protective tariff.

I shall detain the Senate with only one more illustration from history, but I think it is worth recalling.

The famous Walker tariff was passed in 1846. It was based upon the theory that no more money should be collected than was necessary for the wants of the Government, economically administered; that no duty should be imposed upon any article above the low rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue; that below such rate discrimination may be made descending in the scale of duties, or for imperative reasons the article may be placed in the list of those free from all duty; that the maximum revenue duties should be imposed upon luxuries; that all minimums and all specific duties should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their place; that the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

In his report Mr. Walker suggested that while it is impossible to adopt any horizontal scale of duties, or even any arbitrary maximum, experience proves that, as a general rule, a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem will yield the largest revenue.

The Walker tariff at least was different from a good many so-called free-trade tariff laws subsequently put upon the statute books by being reasonably consistent in theory and ostensibly nonsectional in character. It has been frequently claimed, with an appearance of justification, that the usual hard times which appear to follow upon the heels of free-trade legislation did not so occur after the Walker bill was passed, but, on the contrary, that there was prosperity under it. As this is a famous measure in the history of tariff legislation, and as this claim of its success is quite frequently made, just as similar claims are put forth regarding the happy effects of the present Democratic tariff law, I will call attention to Mr. James G. Blaine's reply to Gladstone in the North American Review of January, 1890, entitled "Free trade or protection," as the reasons given by Mr. Blaine for the temporary success of the Walker free-trade or low-tariff law, reciting the causes which disguised the real effect of the law for some time, but did not prevent its ultimate disastrous consequences, are a good deal like the conditions of the war in Europe, which are disguising the operations of the Underwood law, which assumed a menacing front just prior to the breaking out of that war. I will read them:

> The American people had by repeated experience learned that the periods of depression in home manufactures were those in which England most prospered in her commercial relations with the United States, and that these periods of depression had with a single exception, easily explained, followed the enactment by Congress of a free-trade tariff (the phrase "free-trade tariff" involves a contradiction of terms; it is used to designate that form of duty which is levied with no intention to protect domestic manufactures) as certainly as effect follows cause. One of the most suggestive experiments of that kind has its origin in the tariff to which I have just referred, passed in 1846 in apparent harmony with England's newly declared financial policy. At that moment a southern President (Mr. Polk) and a southern Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Robert J. Walker) were far more interested in expanding the area of slave territory than in advancing home manufactures, and were especially eager to make commercial exchanges with Europe on the somewhat difficult basis of cotton at high prices and returning fabrics at low prices.
> Under ordinary circumstances the free-trade tariff of 1846 would have promptly fallen under popular reprobation and been doomed to speedy repeal. But it had a singular history, and for a time was generally acquiesced in, even attaining in many sections a certain degree of popularity. Never did any other tariff meet with so many and so great aids of an adventitious character to sustain it as did this enactment of 1846. Our war with Mexico began just as the duties were lowered, and the consequence was the disbursement of more than $100,000,000 in a way that reached all localities and favorably affected all interests. This was a great sum of money for that period, and for the years 1846, 1847, and 1848 it considerably more than doubled the ordinary outlay of the Government. In the middle of this period the Irish famine occurred and called for an immense export of breadstuffs at high prices. The discovery of gold in California the succeeding year flushed the channels of business as never before by rapidly enlarging the circulation of coin in all parts of the country. Before this outpouring of gold had ceased the three great nations of Europe, as precedence was reckoned at that time—England, France, and Russia—entered upon the Crimean War. The export of manufactures from England and France was checked, the breadstuffs of Russia were blockaded and could not reach the markets of the world. An extraordinary stimulus was thus given to all forms of trade in the United States. For 10 years, 1846 to 1856, these adventitious aids came in regular succession and exerted their powerful influence upon the prosperity of the country.
> The withdrawal or termination of these influences by a treaty of peace in Europe and by the surcease of gold from California placed the tariff of 1846 where a real test of its merits or demerits could be made. It was everywhere asked with apprehension and anxiety, Will this free-trade tariff now develop and sustain the business of this country as firmly and securely as it has been developed and sustained by protection? The answer was made in the ensuing year by a widespread financial panic, which involved the ruin of thousands, including proportionately as many in the South as in the North, leaving the country disordered and distressed in all the avenues of trade. The disastrous results of this tariff upon the permanent industries of the country are described in President Buchanan's well-remembered message, communicated to Congress after the panic: "With unsurpassed plenty in all the elements of national wealth, our manufacturers have suspended, our public works are retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds are abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers are thrown out of employment and reduced to want." This testimony as to the result of a free-trade tariff is all the more forcible from the fact that Mr. Buchanan, as a member of President Polk's Cabinet, had consented to the abandonment of protection, which in his earlier career he had earnestly supported.

As I have said, Mr. President, history repeats itself; and as soon as these foreign complications have passed away, which have disguised the effects of the so-called Underwood law, the same disastrous results will follow that were experienced under the Walker free-trade proposition, when the foreign complications which environed it had disappeared.

I claim, therefore, that it is the duty of the Government to first apply itself to the customhouse for sources of revenue. I put aside for the moment any argument as to whether the duties should be founded upon a strictly revenue basis and an ad valorem duty, or whether they should be fixed upon a protective duty with specific rates and stand on the proposition that what revenue we can reasonably get from this source should be first tried out by the Government. The States are deprived of this source of revenue. The Federal Government has the exclusive right thereto, and, having the exclusive right to a field of great resourcefulness, it does not seem fair to abandon it and thereby unduly encroach upon the sphere of the municipalities and the States. Experience has proven that such imposts and duties are paid by the foreigner and not by the American consumer, and the best illustration of this fact—which I do not intend to get into an argument about—is that the price of living has not gone down under present free-trade legislation, but, on the contrary, has constantly gone up, and was going up even before the war in Europe. However, I am compelled to go further and state that the invariable experience of American history during the Napoleonic wars and subsequent wars in Europe down to our time furnish proof conclusive that our periods of prosperity have only been assured while such conflicts were raging abroad, and that invariably hard times have resulted in America when peace was declared on the other side of the Atlantic. Therefore, at this time beyond all others, whether we are free traders or protectionists, we ought to have, not only for revenue but for industrial preparedness, an adequate protective tariff to prepare us against conditions following the closing days of the war. Full concession is made of this necessity when an alleged protective duty is put upon dyestuffs in the present measure. If on dyestuffs, why not upon everything else which enters into the uses and necessities and comforts of the American people?

The pending measure seems to be drawn without any definite purpose, and is certainly not the result of any preliminary, consistent, logical process or investigation. Thus, when it was clearly demonstrated that the present administration tariff law was not going to produce sufficient revenues for the Government, the emergency-tax law was passed, with stamp taxes most objectionable and unpopular. Of course, the necessity for the passage of this emergency law, so called, was blamed upon the war in Europe, and yet it can easily be demonstrated by statistics, which I expect later on to submit to the Senate, that before the war in Europe it had become very evident that the bill was a failure as a source of revenue, and that some additional system of taxation would have to be adopted. Now, the stamp taxes have been wiped out in the House and largely retained in the Senate, and in the meanwhile we have words of wisdom from the President of the United States regarding taxation. In an address of his delivered at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress December 7, 1915, he declares as follows:

> And there are many additional sources of revenue which can justly be resorted to without hampering the industries of the country or putting any too great charge upon individual expenditure. A tax of 1 cent per gallon on gasoline and naphtha would yield, at the present estimated production, $10,000,000; a tax of 50 cents per horsepower on automobiles and internal-explosion engines, $15,000,000; a stamp tax on bank checks, probably $18,000,000; a tax of 25 cents per ton on pig iron, $10,000,000; a tax of 25 cents per ton on fabricated iron and steel, probably $10,000,000. In a country of great industries like this it ought to be easy to distribute the burdens of taxation without making them anywhere bear too heavily or too exclusively upon any one set of persons or undertakings. What is clear is that the industry of this generation should pay the bills of this generation.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is not in the Chamber, and he has probably overlooked this statesmanlike utterance about "this generation paying its own bills" when he talks about issuing canal bonds for everything for which the Treasury is unable to pay.

Notwithstanding this statement, delivered with an appearance of profound economic wisdom, every one of these suggestions of the President turned out to be impracticable and impossible. The mere suggestion of any of them caused such an outcry throughout the whole country that each of his suggestions was dropped almost as quickly as made, and even the statesmanlike declaration that "the industry of this generation should pay the bills of this generation" is not as clear to the mind of the President or the Democratic leaders as it was then declared to be, because it is openly announced by the chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means that it is intended to use the Panama Canal bonds for expenses incident to the mobilization of the National Guard, and for other purposes, in time of profound peace and when no one yet knows why the guard was ever summoned to the Mexican border or what they are remaining there for.

The bill as amended in the Senate provides for such bond issue, and it is further disclosed in the report of the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate that it is evidently the intention of the Democratic Party to issue bonds for the purchase of ships under the shipping bill and for any other matters the expenses of which there may not be enough money in the Treasury to defray.

It is declared in the report of the Committee on Ways and Means that the necessity for this legislation grows out of the extraordinary increase in the appropriations for the Army and Navy and the fortification of our country. The statement is misleading. The fact is, the tariff and revenue laws passed under the present administration have proved inadequate to raise sufficient revenue. Moreover, reckless obligations have been created, unnecessary projects and schemes of doubtful utility have been authorized, and a general course of lavish expenditure and extravagance has been indulged in, which has not only rendered the raising of additional revenue necessary, but which will prove in the final outcome to continue a very large deficit in the Treasury, on account of the excess of expenditures, made and authorized, over revenues.

Perhaps the chief merit of the bill in the eyes of its framers is that it constitutes a great advance toward the consummation of that long-desired historic purpose and policy of the party now in the majority in Congress to substitute direct taxation for the protective tariff. In this way they can doubtless contemplate with complacency the fact that this bill doubles the rates of the income tax, while the Treasury is losing over $100,000,000 from customs revenues by reason of the free list and the low rates of the present tariff law.

If rigid economy had been practiced by which millions of dollars authorized and appropriated for useless or doubtful purposes would have been saved, if expensive new undertakings had been at least temporarily postponed, if a policy of firmness in dealing with Mexico had been pursued which would have rendered unnecessary the expenditure of $125,000,000 estimated as required to send troops into Mexico and on its border, there would not have been the menace of bankruptcy now facing the Government, nor would there exist the necessity of a bond issue for the expenses of the Army in Mexico in time of peace.

The Sixty-third Congress appropriated $100,000,000 more than any of its predecessors, illustrating how the promises of economy by the Democrats, like their many other pledges made in the campaign, were forgotten or violated; but the record of the present Congress in lavish expenditures during peace surpasses that of the preceding one or indeed of any other Congress in the history of the country. Touching this, attention might be called to the $20,000,000 for a nitrate plant; the river and harbor bill exceeded the appropriation of the last Congress by $22,000,000, despite the efforts of the Republicans to save the entire amount of $42,000,000 appropriated this year; the bill to help the States build public roads commits the Government to the expenditure of $85,000,000, $6,000,000 of which was appropriated this year; the flood-control bill calls for $50,000,000 more for a project of questionable utility, the purpose of which seems to be control of floods at the outlets of streams and not their sources, and incidental to its purpose is the reclamation of overflowed lands. This money was not appropriated outright, but the bill permits the Government to contract obligations which must be met.

Then we have the so-called rural-credits bill with its $15,000,000 of appropriations and providing a large number of political appointments which are specifically taken out of the civil-service regulations.

When the bill was before the Senate, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] tried ineffectually to reduce the number of commissioners created by the bill from five to three, and the salaries from $10,000 to $5,000 each, and every vote cast against the amendment except one was cast by the Democratic majority in this body.

Large salaries and ample appropriations are characteristic of the legislation providing for innumerable commissions with an army of employees for every conceivable purpose.

Again, the shipping bill calls for $50,000,000 to buy ships to meet an alleged emergency. An appropriation for an armor plant amounts to $11,000,000, from which the Government will realize little if any benefit, whilst three large concerns which any other government in the world would be only too glad to have working at as full time as possible, in order to be able to fall back upon them in case of need, are likely to be closed up and ultimately abandoned if the Government plant should ever be constructed.

It is easy to put direct taxes upon a few persons confined largely to one section of the country, and then to spend the money with a lavish and irresponsible hand. That the danger line is at last being recognized as nearly reached is shown by the suggestion that the bill for public buildings, amounting to $30,000,000, is not to be passed at this session.

In addition to the schemes above mentioned are other propositions carried in the various appropriation bills for which an aggregate of $45,000,000 is appropriated over and above the amount carried in last year's bills. With care and scrutiny probably the greater part of this large sum could have been saved.

In other words, these various items actually appropriated amount to $170,000,000 that might have been saved or postponed, to which should be added contract obligations for flood control, river and harbor projects, and perhaps later on public buildings, making another $100,000,000; and these expenditures are all exclusive of preparedness.

Perhaps the most striking instance of extravagance calculated to startle the country is found in the astounding number of additional places created under the present administration. One of the promises of the Democratic Party in 1912 was to return to that simplicity and economy which befits the democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

Not only has this promise not been kept, but new offices have been created in a most reckless way, and with salaries unheard of heretofore. The Republican platform of 1916, probably following the statement of Congressman GOOD, of Iowa, a member of the House Committee on Appropriations, states the number to be 30,000. The additional amount of appropriations involved to pay these employees was stated by Mr. GOOD to be $45,000,000. Other figures and estimates have been made by those who have investigated the subject, but the fact remains that the number of new offices created is greatly in excess of the number ever created in any preceding Congress in the history of the Government. Moreover, the civil-service pledges have been completely disregarded. Thousands of old and new employees have been taken out of the civil service; and the Internal-Revenue Service to-day, by reason of these exceptions, has been converted into a political machine, without any regard for the efficiency of the service in the interest of the taxpayers. The most flagrant instance occurred in the rural-credits bill, where, notwithstanding a full discussion in the Senate, the large force of employees under this scheme were deliberately relieved of the civil-service requirements, with a cunningly devised provision that later on the President might apply the civil service, presumably after the places had all been filled with Democrats.

Running all through the arguments of the advocates of the pending bill is to be heard the note of regret that we do not collect as large an amount of direct taxes as does Great Britain and the nations of Europe. Admiration is expressed for the fact that 58 per cent of the total revenues of Great Britain come from taxes on incomes and inheritances in time of peace. With less than one-half of the population and wealth of the United States, the revenues from incomes and inheritances, including "death duties," in Great Britain were more than four times the revenues derived from these sources by the United States. Similar facts might be cited, it is argued further, as to some of the other leading nations.

The purpose to adopt a fiscal policy modeled after Great Britain and other European nations is openly avowed, securing needed revenues from direct taxes. At last the ideal and the purpose of modern Democracy is being achieved. Taxes are to be placed upon individuals largely residing in a few Northern States and the revenues expended with a lavish hand and no sense of responsibility.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. For the first time they have adopted a double scheme of taxation; first, to assess property, and, in the next place, to assess the income. That is the case in reference to insurance companies. They are first taxed on their capital and surplus so much and then they have to pay an income tax. Then, in addition to that, there is a third tax that they have to pay.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator is entirely right.

Mr. NELSON. It is a system of taxation, I want to say, that we have never had before. The income tax is one thing, the customs tax is another, and what we call the ordinary excise tax is another; but you have now for the first time in this bill an entirely new system taken from the European countries, as the Senator suggests.

Mr. PENROSE. It is a question of hit the head wherever you see it; at any place where a dollar is seen, a tribute must be levied. The Senator is an able lawyer, and he doubtless has grave suspicions as to whether this double taxation is likely to pass muster in our Supreme Court should the matter be taken into litigation.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the Senator call attention to the one industry that has not been stamp taxed, and also the reason why. The present law imposes a tax on each package of gum, but when the number of gum-chewing voters was discovered by the Democratic caucus, there being 700,000 of them in the United States who were voters, the caucus immediately decided gum should not be taxed and would be a splendid thing to eliminate from the pending bill. I must compliment the country that there is one business that has escaped stamp taxation. Because of the many users of gum, the caucus promptly decided it would be the best policy to get taxes from some other source where there were not so many voters involved.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator's illustration is very striking.

Mr. NELSON. If it will not embarrass the Senator——

Mr. PENROSE. No; I am very glad to be interrupted.

Mr. NELSON. In connection with what I just stated a moment ago I should like to read a brief letter bearing on this question. I read an extract from it this morning. It is from the Fire & Marine Insurance Co., of St. Paul, Minn., dated August 19:

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yesterday I wired you as follows:

"Proposed revenue bill retains tax on policies in addition to increased income and capital stock tax My understanding no other corporation taxes on documents issued by it. We can not collect policy tax from insured. Regard unjust to increase income and capital stock tax and retain policy tax. Can you not strike out latter?"

This is the telegram that was sent. Then the letter proceeds:

From information received it seems that the new revenue bill increases the income tax from 1 per cent to 2 per cent, and also imposes a tax of 50 cents upon each thousand dollars of capital and surplus. It also continues in force the policy or premium tax, which, I believe, is one-half of 1 per cent on each dollar of premium written—

That is, the stamp tax—

We are willing to pay our fair share of taxes, but we believe that we are paying far more than the average individual pays, either to the State or the Nation. We believe that the premium tax—should be repealed. Originally it was supposed that the consumer would pay the tax, but we have found it impracticable and impossible to collect it from the consumer or the insured. As a rule, the tax is so small and the complaint is so vigorous and well sustained against any increase in the premium rate that we have to pay the tax and swallow the loss. It amounts to a very large sum in the course of a year. On the 1st of January, 1916, our assets were $11,228,418.82. They were about a million less than that on the 1st of January, 1915. During the year 1915 we paid in taxes to the Federal Government, State government, and municipal corporations over $214,000 for taxes; that is, $14,000 more than we paid in dividends to our stockholders. It was over 2 per cent on the actual value of our assets. I believe that no other corporation or individual pays a tax of 2 per cent on the actual value of all his property except insurance companies. In the minds of a good many people there is a strong prejudice against insurance companies and a belief that they should be taxed to the limit; but it seems to me that justice requires that taxes should be made as equal as possible, consequently I wired you asking you to use your influence in eliminating, if possible, the premium tax.

That is, the stamp tax—

That is, the stamp tax.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the letter brings up the thought that I endeavored to explain at the beginning of my remarks. This is a confederation of States. We are not a highly centralized Government like that of England or France. When they talk about direct taxes paid by an Englishman or an English corporation that is all the taxes the Englishman pays, except some poor rates and parish rates and a few local taxes; it may be his municipal taxes. But here these insurance companies and the individuals and other corporations are burdened by city tax and State taxes. Ours is not a centralized Government. It is a good deal more centralized nowadays than I like to see it, but there is still a little saving grace and a remnant of State sovereignty. These great States must be supported. This bill piles up the pyramid of taxation and puts on a final tax when underneath are all the State taxes, making us in a time of profound peace the most heavily taxed people in the world to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Pennsylvania a few minutes ago, if I understood him correctly, stated that the additional appropriation required for the payment of the salaries of new offices created by this administration would amount to about $40,000,000 or $45,000,000, I believe.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course, the matter is an approximation; but all those who have investigated the subject agree that the cost of the extra places runs from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000, and that the added expense is about $40,000,000, more or less.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amount of salaries to be paid to the new officers that have been created by this administration the Senator says will be about $40,000,000?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; that was confirmed to me only yesterday.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was the Senator's statement. Mr. President, the appropriations for the payment of the salaries of all officers of the Government outside of the Army and Navy are included in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. It is true, I believe, that the salaries of all the civil employees of the Government are carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SIMMONS. Outside of those of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. PENROSE. The Post Office.

Mr. SMOOT. There is the Post Office appropriation bill, and there is the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. PENROSE. And the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. The Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Post Office officials would not be appropriated for in the legislative appropriation bill; neither those of the Agricultural Department would be.

But all the officers in the legislative department, in the executive department, and in the judicial department have their salaries paid out of the appropriations made in what is known as the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. PENROSE. That is not the way the increases are made. There are a lot of commissions.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; in that bill and in the Post Office and the Agricultural bills.

Mr. PENROSE. And the Army and Navy.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated the Army and Navy. Of course, if we go into this preparedness program we will have to enlarge our Army and we will have to enlarge our Navy, but the Democratic Party is not any more responsible for that enlargement than the Republican Party. Of course, when we established the Parcel Post System and the Free Rural Delivery System and the City Delivery System more officials were required to perform those functions and duties of those new activities.

Mr. PENROSE. And a dozen commissions.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I do not suppose that the Senator from Pennsylvania will admit that the Democratic Party is entitled to the entire credit of establishing the Parcel Post System, which has called for the increase of employees to administer it. I do not know that he would be ready to admit that the Democratic Party is entitled to the entire credit for the rural mail system. I wish he would. I would be very glad if he would. It has been necessary, of course, to increase very largely the employees of the Government in order to carry the mails to the farmers of this country. Many millions have had to be added to the Post Office appropriations for that purpose. Many millions were added before the Democratic Party came into power. The Democratic Party has been extending the rural mail service, and, of course, the Democratic Party has been compelled to employ more men for the purpose of extending it, so that the farmers of the country might more largely get the benefits of that service than they did under the Republican Party.

We have increased the pay of the rural carriers, because they were not getting enough; and I think both sides of the Chamber favored that increase. As our cities have grown and as we have extended the mail-delivery system in the cities, of course we have had to increase the number of employees for that purpose. It is a legitimate increase; an increase that the people of the country demanded and required, and good public policy and the welfare of the country demanded it and called for it. We have made it, and as long as we remain in power we will continue to increase these services as required to efficiently serve the public.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to read an extract from a report which has just been made by the Post Office Department showing that there is a postal surplus of $5,742,445?

Mr. SIMMONS. I called attention to that yesterday.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I want it understood that I have the floor. I am perfectly willing to yield for——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Pennsylvania yielded to me to interrupt him at this point.

Mr. PENROSE. I am willing to be interrupted by the chairman of the committee, but not by all others.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania refuse to yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina, but not to everyone.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, of course the Democratic Party has always claimed that it was a friend of the farmer, and it has always in its legislation and its practices shown that it was a friend of the farmer. We have enlarged—and I am very proud of it, and it is one of the great assets of the Democratic Party that it has enlarged—the work and the activities and the functions of the Agricultural Department. We could not, of course, enlarge it without increasing the force. I am not at all ashamed of the fact that we have increased the activities of our Post Office Department, especially in the Rural Delivery Service and the City Delivery Service, and that we have also increased the activities of the Agricultural Department in ministering to the wants and needs of agriculture.

If there be any interest that the Republican Party especially ignored, if there be any interest that the Republican Party especially neglected when in power, it was agriculture. The Republican Party seemed to think that it could build up a great country by establishing and expanding its manufacturing industries at the expense of the farming interests of the country. The Democratic Party does not take that view. We are trying through the Agricultural Department to give the farmers the full benefit of all the help that it is possible for the Federal Government to extend.

In extending that help, in enlarging that help, and making it effective to aid in the development and the rehabilitation of the agriculture of the country, we have increased the employees in that department. I am glad we have done so, for it was proper to do it.

Now, when we come to the other departments, the legislative department, the executive department, and the judicial department, these great departments that we have here in Washington City, the employees being located chiefly here, what has been the increase with respect to them? I undertake to say that if the Senator will examine the record he will find that in those departments there has been practically no increase—certainly not more than a normal increase, an increase in employees commensurate with the increase in the business of those departments, due to the expansion and the growth of the country.

Let me give the Senator some figures if there is any controversy about that. I have the appropriations here which have been made each year, beginning with the year 1912, for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, which include the salaries of all the employees of those departments.

In 1912 the appropriation amounted to $35,378,000; in 1913 it amounted to $34,245,000; in 1914 it amounted to $35,172,000; in 1915 it amounted to $37,631,000; in 1916 it amounted to $36,905,000; and in 1917, the present fiscal year, it amounted to $37,926,000—an increase since 1912 for the salaries of the employees and all other purposes of these three great departments of only a little over $2,000,000. The Senator is talking without information when he makes the statement which he has just made.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has stated what the Democratic Party has done for the farmers since it came into control of the Congress. Let me call the Senator's attention to what the Democratic Party really did.

It took 22 of the leading products of the Northern States, placed 10 of them upon the free list, and compelled the American farmer to compete with the world. It reduced upon the other 5 more than 60 per cent of our defense in the matter of a protective tariff. The immediate result of that was that in my own State of North Dakota the importations of oats, for instance, increased during the first nine months before the war broke out in Europe 22,000,000 bushels—an increase of more than 28,000 per cent over previous importations—and of the increased importations during that period none were less than about 5,000 per cent. Everything that we produced "jumped onto the toboggan" and went plunging down the hill in value until August 3, 1914, when the war in Europe, of course, sent all prices skyward.

Had it not been, Mr. President, for the European war, which created an enormous demand for our food products, the farmers of the Northern States would have been in as bad a condition as they were during the last Cleveland administration. We thank the god of war, and not a Democratic administration, for saving us from this catastrophe.

I have had reason—and I have the table, which I will present probably in this debate—to make a study of this question to determine what benefit the farmers have secured from the Democratic administration. The benefit to the farmer is not measured by what is done in the matter of appropriations for the purpose of providing additional employees, but it is in giving adequate protection. The right of the American farmer is the right to the American market, just so long as he can supply that market for a reasonable compensation in return for the labor he has expended upon the products which he places in that market. The Democratic administration has deprived him of that market, and he has only been saved the natural consequences of an enormous slump in his prices because of the war demands.

But, Mr. President, I rose to call the attention of the Senator to another matter relating to the question of double taxation upon the insurance companies which he was discussing a few moments ago. This morning I received the following telegram from my State:

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., August 21, 1916.

Senator P. J. McCUMBER: Are advised amended revenue bill provides included income tax against insurance companies and continues stamp tax, while other lines are relieved from stamp tax. We maintain insurance second only to transportation in importance and necessity to delivery business of the country, and vitally affects all individual and business interests, large and small. As insurance men and as purchasers of insurance, and on behalf of thousands of individual purchasers of insurance, we protest against this unjust, unwarranted attack on insurance business—

Now, here is a vital matter—

State and local taxes are already very heavy; all efforts to decrease cost to purchaser are defeated by much unjust special taxation, which increases operation expense and cost of insurance protection. Thousands of purchasers in this State and millions of country at large are ultimate sufferers. We ask your active efforts to prevent enactment of this or other legislation result of which is to increase unjustly insurance taxes and the cost of insurance.

The telegram is signed by the Northern Fire & Marine Insurance Co. and by a large number of insurance agents. Accompanying it is another telegram which reads:

AUGUST 21, 1916.

Senator P. J. McCUMBER: Please exert your influence in protecting insurance companies against proposal in revenue bill to continue stamp tax on them alone. Of all corporations this tax cost the National Fire Insurance Co. $50,000 last year and was not borne by the policyholders, as it should have been. The National paid in taxes of all sorts last year over $400,000, which was more than our trade profit.

Now, of all things in the world that should be encouraged in this country it is thrift on the part of our people and the saving of their earnings. Instead of making the cost of insurance to the American people greater than ever, we should make it as little as possible. That one business which looks to the protection of old age ought to be interfered with as little as possible. Insurance rates ought to be lessened to the insured and not increased. We all understand if the cost of conducting the insurance companies is increased, that increase must necessarily be borne in the end by the policyholders, and we ought to refrain from that, Mr. President, if possible. I thank the Senator for giving me this opportunity.

Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. OWEN, and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield first to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in connection with the proposed tax on insurance companies, I called attention some hours ago to the fact that I had received scores of telegrams, one of which I placed in the RECORD. I find on my desk two telegrams, which I feel I ought to read into the RECORD, because, under a mistaken notion, having seen in the newspapers that the Senator from North Carolina had stated that an error had been made in the bill and that the desired remedy would be forthcoming, I have notified those telegraphing and writing me that I thought before the bill was enacted their interests would be protected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not wish the Senator from New Hampshire to misunderstand what I said this morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I do not.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I said this morning was with reference to the provision allowing the insurance companies to deduct on account of their reserves.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I understood that. I was simply saying that, under a mistaken notion on my part, I had written these people that I thought their complaints would be considered and that a remedy would be found. The first telegram I desire to read is as follows:

MANCHESTER, N. H., August 22, 1916.

Senator JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Washington, D. C.:

May we have your assistance in defeating the Federal revenue bill amendment proposing additional taxation on fire insurance companies, and also discriminating against fire insurance companies by continuing indefinitely the stamp tax on policies when other corporations are exempt? We believe it discriminating and unfair.

That telegram is signed by Walter M. Parker, Nathan P. Hunt, and Frank W. Sargeant, three of the leading citizens of the great industrial city of Manchester, N. H.

From Portsmouth, N. H., I have this telegram, dated, August 22:

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Federal revenue bill, as amended by Senate committee, provides 2 per cent per annum tax; also 50 cents per thousand capital stock and surplus; also prohibits deduction on increase of reserve, and continues indefinitely stamp tax on insurance policies. Insurance companies are the only corporations compelled to continue the use of stamps, which seems very unfair.

That is signed by Alfred F. Howard, secretary of a very prosperous local insurance company in the city of Portsmouth, which is serving the people not only of the State of New Hampshire, but of the entire country to some extent, with safe insurance at a low rate. I simply wished to put the telegrams in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire, I take it, understands that the tax of 50 cents a thousand dollars on capital stock and surplus is not a tax imposed exclusively upon insurance companies.

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a tax upon all corporations.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a license tax, a tax to do business, imposed upon all corporations. With reference to the stamp tax I am not able to say to the Senator now what will be done about that. The insurance companies make the point that they have been discriminated against. That is entitled to consideration, and, as I said to the Senator this morning, it shall have consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not quite understand what the Senator means by a "license tax." The insurance company, represented by Hon. Alfred F. Howard, is a State insurance company, licensed to do business by the State and it has to secure a license to do business in every other State if it wishes to expand its business. Now, what does the Senator mean by a license tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that it is characterized in the bill as a special tax for doing business, I think. We have imposed a tax upon brokers, which is in the same category, and on commission merchants. It is in the nature of a license tax. These companies do an interstate business as do brokers and commission merchants. I do not know that it is entirely analogous, but it is in the nature of a tax to do business. The States very frequently impose similar taxes upon corporations for doing business in the State.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me that it is double taxation with a vengeance—treble taxation, in fact. This company pays a large tax to the State. It comes into the District of Columbia and pays a license tax here to do business, and in every other State where it goes to expand its business it is compelled to pay a license tax. Then the Federal Government steps in, and in addition to the State tax and the tax imposed on the company in every other State of the Union the Federal Government puts upon it another so-called license tax.

However, I put these telegrams in the RECORD for the purpose of calling the matter to the attention of the Senator from North Carolina, feeling quite sure that the Senator will find some way to give relief to this industry, which I feel is being heavily burdened.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not understand that that stamp tax applies to any insurance companies except fire insurance companies, does he?

Mr. GALLINGER. No. This is a fire insurance company.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me, in connection with his statement, I should like to call his attention also to the fact that the entire increase in the expenses of the Agricultural Department, which includes salaries and everything else, during the last year was less than $2,000,000. The entire increase in the expenses of the Post Office Department, which includes not only salaries but everything else, was less than $10,000,000. In fact, the entire increase of the Post Office expenses since this administration has come in is less than $30,000,000, including everything.

If the Senator will pardon me further, it will be seen, therefore, that the increase of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriations since 1912 is only about $2,000,000; the Post Office appropriations $9,000,000, covering everything over last fiscal year; the Agricultural appropriations $2,000,000, covering everything over last fiscal year.

If the Senator will pardon me further, I should like to refer briefly to what the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has said as to what has been done for the farmers of this country. I am not going to make a tariff argument. The Senator has made the same argument that he has made here to-day half a dozen times before. In fact, I think if I were to say a dozen times I would not exaggerate it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, let me correct the Senator. I have never before made an argument such as I have made to-day, because I never before had the spectacle of extravagance pictured to my mind that I had to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am speaking about the Senator from North Dakota. The Senator from Pennsylvania makes a great many speeches. He forgets them, sometimes. There are so many of them that he forgets about them. But the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is the Senator about whom I was talking. I say he has made here to-day the same tariff speech with regard to the farmer that he has made here a great many times in the past.

We did put some things that the farmer produces on the free list, as we put some things other people produced upon the free list; and we did it properly, and it has been very beneficial. But we put many things that the farmer buys, also, upon the free list. Nearly everything that the farmer has to buy for the purpose of making his crop we put upon the free list in order to enable him to get them at a reduced price.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; not at this minute. We did this, Mr. President, and up to the time the war began the farmer was doing splendidly, notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from North Dakota. The prices of his products had not decreased.

I remember, and the Senator from Pennsylvania will remember, that before the war broke out we had many debates here in the Senate about the continued high cost of living, and nearly every day Senators on the other side were rising in their places and twitting the Democrats upon the fact, as they alleged it to be, that the cost of living had not gone down as we had promised as a result of the reductions in tariff exactions. They singled out eggs and meat and nearly everything the farmer produces to show we had not reduced the cost of living as we had promised. The cost of living consists chiefly in the consumption of the things which the farmer produces, and we were twitted with the fact that instead of a reduction in the price of these things that enter so materially into the cost of living they had been advanced. Now, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], when he thinks we have forgotten about that, comes here and sings a song of woe about the falling off in the price of farm products before the war.

The truth is, Mr. President, that from the day of the passage of the Democratic tariff act up to the present time, the farmer has been getting on better than he ever did before, and to-day he is enjoying unexampled prosperity.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has the floor.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania is willing to yield for the purpose for which I rise. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

SPOKANE, WASH., August 22, 1916.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Spokane Branch Insurance Federation of State of Washington, membership consisting of every branch of the insurance business, also business and professional men, are advised that House of Representatives eliminated stamp tax on insurance companies. Senate committee restored stamp requirement. All corporations except insurance companies have been relieved of stamp tax. This tax is discriminatory and unjust. We by resolution are unanimous in urging that you use every honorable means to secure its elimination.

INSURANCE FEDERATION OF WASHINGTON,
T. K. BINNIE, Vice President.
W. S. MCCREA,
F. S. JONES,
JOHN J. CADIGAN,
H. W. NEWTON,
Executive Committee.
THEODORE GENTSCH, Secretary.

Mr. JONES. I also present telegrams from the Frank B. Grinnell Co., and sundry other business firms of Spokane; from E. A. Strout & Co., James J. Dennis, and Pliny L. Allen, of Seattle; and from H. J. Schwinn & Co. (Inc.), Hellar Lyon & Co., Fowler & Whithouse Insurance Corporation, and R. E. Anderson & Co., of Tacoma, all in the State of Washington, remonstrating against a stamp tax on the insurance companies. They are of substantially the same character, and I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegrams will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 6926) to correct the military record of Charles K. Bolster; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 6927) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Dunton (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6928) granting an increase of pension to Henry Ramsdell (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6929) granting an increase of pension to Eugene H. Otis (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 6931) for the relief of the Tennessee Deaf and Dumb School, of Knoxville, Tenn. (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS.

Mr. POMERENE. I introduce a joint resolution, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. For the information of the Senate I request that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD. It is brief, and I think its merits will appeal to Senators.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 169) interpreting section 50 of the act of June 3, 1916, for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in the interpretation and execution of section 50 of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, credit shall be given as for service in the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps to any member of that division for any period or periods of time during which such member has received or shall have received at an educational institution under the direction of an officer of the Army, detailed as professor of military science and tactics, a course of military training substantially equivalent to that prescribed by regulations under this section for the corresponding period or periods of training of the senior division, Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. THOMAS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION DOCUMENTS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have copies of two pamphlets which have been issued by the Federal Trade Commission. One is an article on "A system of accounts for retail merchants" and the other is entitled "Fundamentals of a cost system for manufacturers." These pamphlets have been printed by the Federal Trade Commission in limited numbers only because of the small appropriation for that purpose. There is a very great demand for both of them, however, and I desire to have them printed as Senate documents. I have no objection to the documents being first referred to the Committee on Printing for action if that is the desire of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The documents presented by the Senator from Ohio will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

POSTAL SURPLUS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I present a short article taken from the Washington Post of Tuesday, August 22, 1916, being a report of the Auditor for the Post Office Department relative to the postal surplus, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POSTAL SURPLUS $5,742,445—AUDITOR MAKES REPORT TELLING OF BIG IMPROVEMENTS IN 1916.

The Auditor for the Post Office Department yesterday reported an audited surplus of the department for the fiscal year 1916 of $5,742,445, according to a statement given out yesterday by the Postmaster General. The announcement of this result at this time is the earliest date in the history of the Postal Service that such a report has ever been made, and is due to improved system of accounting and of the high standard of efficiency among postmasters, which the auditor reports as being "higher at present than at any time during the past quarter of a century."

During the four years of this administration the Postmaster General has paid into the Treasury $12,500,000, being a net gain to the general revenue of $1,162,061.

"This successful handling of postal finance by this administration has been brought about," says the report, "while at the same time it increased the number of rural routes and extensions by more than 10,000 and the number of people served on rural routes from 23,278,290 to 26,307,685.

"It has also extended the City Delivery Service to more than 5,000,000 additional patrons of the post office, including 243 cities which heretofore had never had free delivery, and it has increased its mail transportation by service on 6,248.09 miles of railway." Moreover, "it has several times increased the weight and size limit and twice reduced the rates on parcel-post matter.

"The delivery by automobile and other conveyances has increased in three years by 17,484,408 parcels, or 100 per cent, at the 50 largest offices in the United States. It also developed and simplified the Postal Savings System so as to increase the number of deposits from 310,000 to 616,000 and the amount deposited from $30,036,325 to over $92,000,000.

"The postal efficiency at this time is higher than was ever known in the history of the service."

ADDRESS BY THOMAS WALL SHELTON.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have a copy of an address by Thomas Wall Shelton, of Norfolk, Va., chairman of the committee on uniform judicial procedure of the American Bar Association, delivered before the North Carolina State Bar Association at Wrightsville Beach, N. C., June 27, 1916. I desire to have the address printed as a public document and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The paper will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

CLARENCE C. KRESS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that Order of Business No. 718, being the bill (S. 3180) to authorize the appointment of Clarence C. Kress to the grade of captain, United States Army, Medical Corps, be taken from the calendar and be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (No. 55) of the House of Representatives, which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in enrolling the District of Columbia appropriation bill, H. R. 15774, the Clerk is directed, on page 43, line 18, of the original bill, to enroll the salary of the janitor of the old Central High School building and annex in the sum of $1,000, and correct the total of the amended paragraph and the total on page 46, in line 14 of the bill, by inserting the sum of $2,680 and $174,470, respectively.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 533).

Mr. OWEN. I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 13391) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, by adding a new section, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13391) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, by adding a new section, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert the following:

"That the act entitled 'Federal reserve act,' approved December 23, 1913, be, and is hereby, amended as follows:

"At the end of section 11 insert a new clause as follows:

"'(m) Upon the affirmative vote of not less than five of its members the Federal Reserve Board shall have power, from time to time, by general ruling, covering all districts alike, to permit member banks to carry in the Federal reserve banks of their respective districts any portion of their reserves now required by section 19 of this act to be held in their own vaults.'

"That section 13 be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'Any Federal reserve bank may receive from any of its member banks, and from the United States, deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, Federal reserve notes, or checks, and drafts, payable upon presentation, and also, for collection, maturing bills; or solely for purposes of exchange or of collection, may receive from other Federal reserve banks deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, or checks upon other Federal reserve banks, and checks and drafts, payable upon presentation within its district, and maturing bills payable within its district.

"'Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice, and protest by such bank as to its own indorsement exclusively, any Federal reserve bank may discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange arising out of actual commercial transactions; that is, notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, or the proceeds of which have been used, or are to be used, for such purposes, the Federal Reserve Board to have the right to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible for discount, within the meaning of this act. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit such notes, drafts, and bills of exchange, secured by staple agricultural products, or other goods, wares, or merchandise from being eligible for such discount; but such definition shall not include notes, drafts, or bills covering merely investments or issued or drawn for the purpose of carrying or trading in stocks, bonds, or other investment securities, except bonds and notes of the Government of the United States. Notes, drafts, and bills admitted to discount under the terms of this paragraph must have a maturity at the time of discount of not more than 90 days, exclusive of days of grace: Provided, That notes, drafts, and bills drawn or issued for agricultural purposes or based on live stock and having a maturity not exceeding six months, exclusive of days of grace, may be discounted in an amount to be limited to a percentage of the assets of the Federal reserve bank, to be ascertained and fixed by the Federal Reserve Board.

"'The aggregate of such notes, drafts, and bills bearing the signature or indorsement of any one borrower, whether a person, company, firm, or corporation, rediscounted for any one bank shall at no time exceed 10 per cent of the unimpaired capital and surplus of said bank; but this restriction shall not apply to the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values.

"'Any Federal reserve bank may discount acceptances of the kinds hereinafter described, which have a maturity at the time of discount of not more than three months' sight, exclusive of days of grace, and which are indorsed by at least one member bank.

"'Any member bank may accept drafts or bills of exchange drawn upon it having not more than six months' sight to run, exclusive of days of grace, which grow out of transactions involving the importation or exportation of goods; or which grow out of transactions involving the domestic shipment of goods provided shipping documents conveying or securing title are attached at the time of acceptance; or which are secured at the time of acceptance by a warehouse receipt or other such document conveying or securing title covering readily marketable staples. No member bank shall accept, whether in a foreign or domestic transaction, for any one person, company, firm, or corporation to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than 10 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus unless the bank is secured either by attached documents or by some other actual security growing out of the same transaction as the acceptance and no bank shall accept such bills to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than one-half of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus, except by authority of the Federal Reserve Board, under such general regulations as said board may prescribe, but not to exceed the capital stock and surplus of such bank, and such regulations shall apply to all banks alike regardless of the amount of capital stock and surplus.

"'Any Federal reserve bank may make advances to its member banks on their promissory notes for a period not exceeding 15 days at rates to be established by such Federal reserve banks, subject to the review and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, provided such promissory notes are secured by such notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or bankers' acceptances as are eligible for rediscount or for purchase by Federal reserve banks under the provisions of this act, or by the deposit or pledge of bonds or notes of the United States.'

"Section 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended so as to read as follows: 'No national banking association shall at any time be indebted, or in any way liable, to an amount exceeding the amount of its capital stock at such time actually paid in and remaining undiminished by losses or otherwise, except on account of demands of the nature following:

"'First. Notes of circulation.

"'Second. Moneys deposited with or collected by the association.

"'Third. Bills of exchange or drafts drawn against money actually on deposit to the credit of the association or due thereto.

"'Fourth. Liabilities to the stockholders of the association for dividends and reserve profits.

"'Fifth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of the Federal reserve act.

"'The discount and rediscount and the purchase and sale by any Federal reserve bank of any bills receivable and of domestic and foreign bills of exchange, and of acceptances authorized by this act, shall be subject to such restrictions, limitations, and regulations as may be imposed by the Federal Reserve Board.

"'That in addition to the powers now vested by law in national banking associations organized under the laws of the United States any such association located and doing business in any place the population of which does not exceed 5,000 inhabitants, as shown by the last preceding decennial census, may, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, act as the agent for any fire, life, or other insurance company authorized by the authorities of the State in which said bank is located to do business in said State by soliciting and selling insurance and collecting premiums on policies issued by such company; and may receive for services so rendered such fees or commissions as may be agreed upon between the said association and the insurance company for which it may act as agent; and may also act as the broker or agent for others in making or procuring loans on real estate located within 100 miles of the place in which said bank may be located, receiving for such services a reasonable fee or commission: Provided, however, That no such bank shall in any case guarantee either the principal or interest of any such loans or assume or guarantee the payment of any premium on insurance policies issued through its agency by its principal: And provided further, That the bank shall not guarantee the truth of any statement made by an assured in filing his application for insurance.

"'Any member bank may accept drafts or bills of exchange drawn upon it having not more than three months' sight to run, exclusive of days of grace, drawn under regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board by banks or bankers in foreign countries or dependencies or insular possessions of the United States for the purpose of furnishing dollar exchange as required by the usages of trade in the respective countries, dependencies, or insular possessions. Such drafts or bills may be acquired by Federal reserve banks in such amounts and subject to such regulations, restrictions, and limitations as may be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board: Provided, however, That no member bank shall accept such drafts or bills of exchange referred to this paragraph for any one bank to an amount exceeding in the aggregate 10 per cent of the paid-up and unimpaired capital and surplus of the accepting bank unless the draft or bills of exchange is accompanied by documents conveying or securing title or by some other adequate security: Provided further, That no member bank shall accept such drafts or bills in an amount exceeding at any time the aggregate of one-half of its paid-up and unimpaired capital and surplus.'

"That subsection (e) of section 14 be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'(e) To establish accounts with other Federal reserve banks for exchange purposes and, with the consent of the Federal Reserve Board, to open and maintain accounts in foreign countries, appoint correspondents, and establish agencies in such countries wheresoever it may deem best for the purpose of purchasing, selling, and collecting bills of exchange, and to buy and sell, with or without its indorsement, through such correspondents or agencies, bills of exchange arising out of actual commercial transactions which have not more than 90 days to run, exclusive of days of grace, and which bear the signature of two or more responsible parties, and with the consent of the Federal Reserve Board to open and maintain banking accounts for such foreign correspondents or agencies.'

"That the second paragraph of section 16 be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'Any Federal reserve bank may make application to the local Federal reserve agent for such amount of the Federal reserve notes hereinbefore provided for as it may require. Such application shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances rediscounted under the provisions of section 13 of this act, or bills of exchange indorsed by a member bank of any Federal reserve district and purchased under the provisions of section 14 of this act, or bankers' acceptances purchased under the provisions of said section 14. The Federal reserve agent shall each day notify the Federal Reserve Board of all issues and withdrawals of Federal reserve notes to and by the Federal reserve bank to which he is accredited. The said Federal Reserve Board may at any time call upon a Federal reserve bank for additional security to protect the Federal reserve notes issued to it.'

"That section 24 be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 24. Any national banking association not situated in a central reserve city may make loans secured by improved and unencumbered farm land situated within its Federal reserve district or within a radius of 100 miles of the place in which such bank is located, irrespective of district lines, and may also make loans secured by improved and unencumbered real estate located within 100 miles of the place in which such bank is located, irrespective of district lines; but no loan made upon the security of such farm land shall be made for a longer time than five years, and no loan made upon the security of such real estate as distinguished from farm land shall be made for a longer time than one year nor shall the amount of any such loan, whether upon such farm land or upon such real estate, exceed 50 per cent of the actual value of the property offered as security. Any such bank may make such loans, whether secured by such farm land or such real estate, in an aggregate sum equal to 25 per cent of its capital and surplus or to one-third of its time deposits and such banks may continue hereafter as heretofore to receive time deposits and to pay interest on the same.

"'The Federal Reserve Board shall have power from time to time to add to the list of cities in which national banks shall not be permitted to make loans secured upon real estate in the manner described in this section.'

"That section 25 be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 25. Any national banking association possessing a capital and surplus of $1,000,000 or more may file application with the Federal Reserve Board for permission to exercise, upon such conditions and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the said board, either or both of the following powers:

"'First. To establish branches in foreign countries or dependencies or insular possessions of the United States for the furtherance of the foreign commerce of the United States, and to act if required to do so as fiscal agents of the United States.

"'Second. To invest an amount not exceeding in the aggregate 10 per cent of its paid-in capital stock and surplus in the stock of one or more banks or corporations chartered or incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, and principally engaged in international or foreign banking, or banking in a dependency or insular possession of the United States either directly or through the agency, ownership, or control of local institutions in foreign countries, or in such dependencies or insular possessions.

"'Such application shall specify the name and capital of the banking association filing it, the powers applied for, and the place or places where the banking operations proposed are to be carried on. The Federal Reserve Board shall have power to approve or to reject such application in whole or in part if for any reason the granting of such application is deemed inexpedient, and shall also have power from time to time to increase or decrease the number of places where such banking operations may be carried on.

"'Every national banking association operating foreign branches shall be required to furnish information concerning the condition of such branches to the Comptroller of the Currency upon demand, and every member bank investing in the capital stock of banks or corporations described under subparagraph 2 of the first paragraph of this section shall be required to furnish information concerning the condition of such banks or corporations to the Federal Reserve Board upon demand, and the Federal Reserve Board may order special examinations of the said branches, banks, or corporations at such time or times as it may deem best.

"'Before any national bank shall be permitted to purchase stock in any such corporation the said corporation shall enter into an agreement or undertaking with the Federal Reserve Board to restrict its operations or conduct its business in such manner or under such limitations and restrictions as the said board may prescribe for the place or places wherein such business is to be conducted. If, at any time the Federal Reserve Board shall ascertain that the regulations prescribed by it are not being complied with, said board is hereby authorized and empowered to institute an investigation of the matter and to send for persons and papers, subpœna witnesses, and administer oaths in order to satisfy itself as to the actual nature of the transactions referred to. Should such investigation result in establishing the failure of the corporation in question, or of the national bank or banks which may be stockholders therein, to comply with the regulations laid down by the said Federal Reserve Board, such national banks may be required to dispose of stock holdings in the said corporation upon reasonable notice.

"'Every such national banking association shall conduct the accounts of each foreign branch independently of the accounts of other foreign branches established by it and of its home office, and shall at the end of each fiscal period transfer to its general ledger the profit or loss accrued at each branch as a separate item.

"'Any director or other officer, agent, or employee of any member bank may, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, be a director or other officer, agent, or employee of any such bank or corporation above mentioned in the capital stock of which such member bank shall have invested as hereinbefore provided, without being subject to the provisions of section 8 of the act approved October 15, 1914, entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes."'"

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend certain sections of the act entitled 'Federal reserve act,' approved December 23, 1913."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13391) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, by adding a new section, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action agreed upon by the conference committee:

The amendments of the Senate to the bill have been accepted by the House conferees with some slight verbal modifications, except that the House declined to agree to, and the Senate receded from, its amendment of section 16 of the Federal reserve act which would have explicitly authorized and encouraged Federal reserve banks to issue Federal reserve notes based upon gold or gold certificates.

The House conferees declined to agree to the Senate amendment proposing to permit national banks in cities of more than 100,000 inhabitants, and possessing a capital and surplus of $1,000,000 or more, to establish branches, and the Senate conferees have agreed to recommend that the Senate recede from this amendment.

The House conferees insisted upon an amendment to section 11, which was accepted by the Senate conferees, permitting the Federal Reserve Board, upon an affirmative vote of not less than five, to permit member banks to carry in the Federal reserve banks any portion of their reserves now required to be held in their own vaults.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator desire consideration of the report this evening? If not, I ask that it be printed.

Mr. OWEN. No; I ask that the conference report lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will be printed.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate I desire to have printed in the RECORD certain letters from the Secretary of Agriculture and from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, August 14, 1916.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: In accordance with your request, this department desires to call your attention to certain provisions of H. R. 16763, an act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, as amended and referred to the Committee on Finance. You will remember that this matter was discussed with you within the last few days by Mr. Husmann, of this department.

Specific reference is made to section 301, under Title IV, "Miscellaneous taxes." You will note that this section incorporates in the bill a definition of wine within the meaning of the food and drugs act, with the enforcement of which this department is concerned. This provision permits the addition of "a solution of water and commercially pure cane, beet, or dextrose sugar to the must or to the wine," within a maximum limit of 35 per cent, with certain restrictions as to acidity and alcoholic content, and provides that the article so prepared shall "be deemed to be wine * * * within the meaning of the food and drugs act of June 30, 1906." The restriction as to acidity and alcoholic content would not in practice prevent material dilution in the majority of cases, so that this provision practically amounts to permission to add 35 per cent of a solution of cane, beet, or dextrose sugar to the must or wine.

The attitude of this department relative to the term "wine" under the provisions of the food and drugs act has been published in food-inspection decision 156, copy of which is inclosed herewith for your information. This decision was prepared on the basis of information which is believed to be complete and reliable with reference to the practices of wine making prevalent in this country and the meaning of the term "wine" as understood by the consumer. You will note that this decision permits the addition of sugar under certain circumstances, but does not provide for the addition of water as given in section 301 of H. R. 16763, as amended. It is evident that this provision of the latter will apply both to dry and sweet wines.

This department would regard the enactment into law of the above provisions of section 301 as extremely prejudicial to the interests of the consumer of wine, as well as contrary to the purpose and intent of the food and drugs act, inasmuch as the department feels assured from the results of its investigations that such addition of water is no less than a form of adulteration which is prohibited by that act.

This matter was called to the attention of this department by Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, when H. R. 16763 was before that committee, and there are inclosed herewith, for your information in this respect, copies of Mr. KITCHIN'S letter and the reply of this department.

The department deems it desirable to call this matter to your attention as outlined above, inasmuch as section 301 if enacted into law would nullify to a great extent the provisions of the food and drugs act with respect to adulteration and misbranding of wine. For illustration: Under the terms of section 301 the producer of a wine of the general characteristics of a genuine Burgundy, produced in France, may label it "Burgundy wine," without qualification and without any statement on the label to indicate otherwise than that it is a genuine French product. Furthermore, the insertion in a statute like this of a definition of a food or drug subject to the food and drugs act, especially where, as here, the result would be exemption from the consequences of adulteration or misbranding under the food and drugs act, is a dangerous precedent.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, August 21, 1916.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SIMMONS: It has come to the attention of this department that section 53 of H. R. 16763, "an act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," as reported to the Senate by the Committee on Finance, contains provisions which materially affect the administration of the food and drugs act of June 30, 1906.

As reported, section 53 defines wine within the meaning of the food and drugs act as well as within the meaning of the revenue act, and includes within the definition "the product made from the juice of sound, ripe grapes by complete fermentation of the must under proper cellar treatment and corrected by the addition (under the supervision of a gauger or storekeeper-gauger in the capacity of gauger) of a solution of water and commercially pure cane, beet, or dextrose sugar to the must or to the wine, when such addition shall not increase the volume more than 35 per cent, so that the resultant product does not contain less than five parts per thousand of acid before fermentation and not more than 13 per cent of alcohol after complete fermentation."

The section also authorized the labeling, transportation, and sale of this product under the unqualified name of wine, permits it to be designated by its type or variety or locality where produced, and further permits the addition of a solution of sugar and water to the must or wine in excess of 35 per cent in unlimited amounts, products of this latter class to be labeled under the direction of the Department of Agriculture.

As you are aware, the object of the food and drugs act is to prevent the shipment in interstate and foreign commerce and sale in the Territories and the District of Columbia of adulterated and misbranded articles of food and drugs. This department regards wine in the process of the manufacture of which more water is added than is necessary to correct natural defects in the must as being both adulterated and misbranded. The food and drugs act confers no authority upon this department to supervise the manufacture of wine. In food inspection decision 120 the three Secretaries charged with the duty of making regulations for the enforcement of the food and drugs act authorized the addition of a sugar solution to grape must before fermentation for corrective purposes. Investigations of the department showed that this decision resulted in abuses, in that water was added to the must in amounts greatly in excess of that necessary to make merchantable products. Food inspection decision 120 was therefore abrogated and the views of the department with reference to wine under the food and drugs act announced in food inspection decision 156, copy inclosed. This decision permits the addition to the must of sugar and neutralizing agents, but does not permit the addition of any water.

The addition of water in any amount to the must is not now countenanced under the food and drugs act, because under that act the department has no authority to control the amounts which are actually added, and experience has shown that permission to add water without Government supervision of the process of manufacture leads to the addition of water in unlimited amounts. It is suggested, if the addition of water is to be authorized, that adequate supervision by internal-revenue officers be provided, and that the amount which may be added be limited to such an amount as may be required to produce a merchantable product. According to the information of the department, it is unnecessary for this purpose to add in any case water in an amount which will increase the volume more than 25 per cent.

Section 53 of the bill permits the addition of a sugar solution of 35 per cent, irrespective of whether it is necessary to add the sugar solution for the purpose of correcting natural defects. The section contemplated that the sugar solution may be added under the supervision of internal-revenue officers, but no authority is conferred upon such officers to specify how much shall be added to any particular batch of the must; and, further, this department is informed that the current appropriations for the Internal Revenue Office are inadequate for the employment of storekeeper-gaugers or gaugers to perform the work of supervision.

The department recognizes the fact that Congress, desiring to tax wine, must state what it is, and it believes that producers should be permitted to correct natural defects in the must, but the addition of water should be safeguarded so as not to authorize the transportation and sale of articles which are adulterated and misbranded under the food and drugs act and thereby open the door to fraudulent practices. Unless adequate powers are conferred and adequate means provided for governmental supervision of the process of manufacture, the department knows of no means by which undue stretching of wines can be prevented. Furthermore, the department regards the inclusion of a definition of wine in a revenue act for the purpose of affecting the administration of the food and drugs act as an undesirable precedent, especially where, as in House bill 16763, the effect of the definition is to sanction the sale and shipment of articles which are considered to be adulterated under that act.

There is submitted for your consideration the inclosed tentative draft of a substitute for section 53, in which reference to the food and drugs act is omitted; the maximum of the sugar solution which may be added is limited to 25 per cent; the maximum of the sugar solution which may be added in any must is limited to the amount necessary for the production of a merchantable product; the addition of the sugar solution is made subject to the rules and regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and it is specifically provided that no article included within the section shall be labeled, transported, or sold under any name, statement, design, or device which is false or misleading in any particular.

The department communicated its view regarding the amelioration of wine by the use of sugar and water to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives when House bill 16763 was under consideration by that committee. Copy of the department's letter of June 26, 1916, to Representative KITCHIN is inclosed for your information.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C.

FOOD INSPECTION DECISION 156.

WINE.

As a result of investigations carried on by this department and of the evidence submitted at a public hearing given on November 5, 1913, the Department of Agriculture has concluded that gross deceptions have been practiced under food-inspection decision 120. The department has also concluded that the definition of wine in food-inspection decision 109 should be modified so as to permit correction of the natural defects in grape musts and wines due to climatic or seasonal conditions.

Food-inspection decisions 109 and 120 are, therefore, hereby abrogated, and, as a guide for the officials of this department in enforcing the food-and-drugs act, wine is defined to be the product of the normal alcoholic fermentation of the juice of fresh, sound, ripe grapes, with the usual cellar treatment.

To correct the natural defects above mentioned the following additions to musts or wines are permitted:

In the case of excessive acidity, neutralizing agents which do not render wine injurious to health, such as neutral potassium tartrate or calcium carbonate;

In the case of deficient acidity, tartaric acid;

In the case of deficiency in saccharine matter, condensed grape must or a pure dry sugar.

The foregoing definition does not apply to sweet wines made in accordance with the sweet-wine fortification act of June 7, 1906 (34 Stat., 215).

A product made from pomace, by the addition of water, with or without sugar or any other material whatsoever, is not entitled to be called wine. It is not permissible to designate such a product as "pomace wine," nor otherwise than as "imitation wine."

D. F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 12, 1914.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., June 26, 1916.

Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of June 23, 1916, addressed to Dr. Alsberg, regarding the amelioration of wine with sugar and water.

This department sees no reason to doubt the statement that the amelioration of wine with sugar or water has been practiced to a greater or less extent since 1836 in Ohio and Missouri. There is no doubt, however, that such use of sugar and water has been subject to great abuse and has not been limited to the bounds established by varying climatic conditions. This abuse of the addition of water represents, in fact, the crux of the entire situation, inasmuch as it results in lowering the standard of wines other than fortified sweet wines, thus working a hardship to the producer of pure wines, as well as being confusing and misleading to the purchaser in case such diluted wines are sold under the simple designation "wine" without any explanatory statement showing the presence of water. The addition of water and sugar to fortified sweet wine is, as you doubtless are aware, subject to limitation under the terms of existing statutes, and food-inspection decision does not, therefore, apply to such wines.

The statement that the amelioration of wine with sugar and water was recognized as a legitimate practice in wine making by this department until about two years ago, when food-inspection decision 120 was abrogated by food-inspection decision 156, is not correct, inasmuch as food-inspection decision 109, which represents the first pronouncement of opinion with respect to the designation "wine" under the food and drugs act, was issued August 24, 1909. Food-inspection decisions 109, 120, and 156 are inclosed herewith for your convenience in noting the action which has been taken from time to time. Food-inspection decision 109 states that "the addition of water or sugar, or both, to the must prior to fermentation is considered improper, and a product so treated should not be called 'wine' without further characterizing it." On the basis of representations which were made in behalf of the Ohio and Missouri wine makers, food-inspection decision 109 was modified by the issuance of food-inspection decision 120, so as to provide that wine other than fortified sweet wine made from Ohio and Missouri grapes might, when made by the addition of a sugar solution within specified limits, be properly designated as "Ohio Wine" or "Missouri Wine," as the case might be, qualified by the particular kind of type to which such wine belonged. In view of the fact that gross deception was practiced under the terms of this decision, both with respect to so-called "pomace wine" and wines other than fortified sweet wines, and the trade practices employed thereunder resulted in a degradation of the standards for such wines, it was deemed advisable to modify this decision, as indicated in food-inspection decision 156. The latter opinion, as you will note, provides means for correcting excessive acidity, deficient acidity, and deficiency in saccharine matter, but does not provide for the addition of water, inasmuch as it is believed that natural defects may be corrected by the means indicated without the necessity for dilution with water.

It has not been held that the amelioration of wine with sugar and water renders the article deleterious to health or makes it in any wise unwholesome. The objection to such use of both sugar and water is based on the fact that permission to practice such amelioration under terms such as are indicated in food-inspection decision 120 has invariably resulted in gross abuses which, through force of competition, have lowered the standards for wine. There can be no question that it is highly undesirable that undiluted wines and wines which have been subjected to varying degrees of dilution should in common be designated by the simple term "wine" without any qualifying statement to show that the latter have in fact been diluted with water. Such indiscriminate use of the designation "wine" is quite misleading to the purchaser and is believed to come squarely within the provisions of the food and drugs act which prohibit such misleading and deceptive practices.

Your attention, however, is called to the fact that food-inspection decision 156 does not prohibit the production and sale of wine made from fresh grapes when ameliorated with sugar and water, but simply has the effect of requiring that wine so treated shall be labeled and designated in such a manner that the purchaser is informed of the nature of the article, and does not believe it to be a pure, undiluted wine. The last decision, No. 156, as you will note, applies to all wines other than sweet wines made in accordance with the sweet-wine fortification act, as well as to so-called "pomace wine."

In conclusion, the department believes that it is highly important under the terms of the food and drugs act that the simple designation "wine" without qualification shall not be applied indiscriminately to pure wine and wine which has been subjected to dilution with water. I shall be pleased to furnish you with such further available information as you may require in connection with this matter.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT RECOMMENDED BY THE AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT, AND TO BE OFFERED BY MR. PHELAN.

SEC. 53. That wine for the purposes of this act shall be deemed to be the product made from the normal alcoholic fermentation of the juice of sound, ripe grapes without addition or abstraction, except such as may occur in the usual cellar treatment of clarifying and aging: Provided, however, That the product made from the juice of sound, ripe grapes by complete fermentation of the must under proper cellar treatment and corrected by the addition, under the supervision of a gauger or storekeeper-gauger in the capacity of gauger and subject to rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, of a solution of water and commercially pure cane, beet, or dextrose sugar, to the must or to the wine in amounts necessary to correct natural defects; when such addition shall not increase the volume more than 25 per cent, so that the resultant product does not contain less than five parts per thousand of acid before fermentation and not more than 13 per cent of alcohol after complete fermentation, shall also be deemed to be wine for the purposes of this act: And provided further, That wine as defined in this section may be sweetened with cane sugar or beet sugar or pure condensed grape must and fortified shall be considered sweet wine for the purposes of this act: And provided further, That no product included within this section shall be labeled, transported, or sold under any name, statement, design, or device which is false or misleading in any particular.

JUNE 3, 1916.

Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KITCHIN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant, inclosing a copy of H. R. 13282, entitled "A bill to provide revenue by taxing wine, and for other purposes," with certain proposed amendments which you submit for such suggestions as I may deem proper.

The amendments consist:

1. In a reclassification of the wines and the imposition of the following rates of tax in place of those now contained in the bill, namely, on wines containing not more than 14 per cent of absolute alcohol, a tax of 3 cents a gallon; on wines containing more than 14 per cent and not exceeding 21 per cent, 10 cents a gallon, with a proviso that all wines containing more than 21 per cent of absolute alcohol shall be classed as distilled spirits and shall pay tax accordingly.

Regarding these proposed amendments, I would state that the classification and rates contained in the bill and recommended in my letter to you under date of March 6, 1916, and also in a letter addressed to Representative KENT under date of March 15, were the rates which, from the best information obtainable, seem to be the most likely to produce the maximum revenue at this time without injury to the wine industry.

It was then represented that the various classes of wines covered by the bill could not bear a higher rate of tax than then recommended, and, in the absence of any further information on this subject, I do not feel to be in a position to pass judgment upon the proposed higher rate of tax and the proposed tax of 10 cents a gallon on brandy for fortification of wines; nor does the time in which reply to your letter is requested enable the department to give this matter fuller consideration. It is, however, estimated that, under the proposed readjustment of the taxes on all classes of wines, and the proposed tax of 10 cents per gallon on brandy used in fortifying wines, that the amount of revenue would, under this amended bill, somewhat exceed that estimated for the pending bill, provided the increased rate of tax did not adversely affect the production of wines. If the imposition of the rates now proposed will have no detrimental effect on the wine-growing and wine-making industries, I see no objection to the same.

2. Regarding the further proposed amendment by striking out section 3 of the bill and substituting therefor a provision, to follow section 1, for levying and assessing against the wine maker or producer of "all wines fortified under the provisions and conforming to the requirements of the sections of the tariff act of October 1, 1890, relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines, as amended, and as further amended by this act, a tax of 10 cents on each taxable gallon of grape brandy or wine spirits used by him in the fortification of such wines," I would state that in the opinion of this department those portions of the act of October 1, 1890, and of the amendatory act of June 7, 1906, relating to the fortification of wines were repealed by the emergency revenue law of October 22, 1914. As this last-named act will expire by limitation December 31, 1916, the question might arise whether a provision, based on a repealed statute, would not be void and of no effect. If this provision is included in the law, it should be changed to meet that possibility, and it should be modified and incorporated in section 3 as follows:

That under such regulations and official supervision and upon the giving of such notices, entries, bonds, and other securities as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, any producer of wines taxable under the provisions of this act may withdraw from any fruit distillery or special bonded warehouse grape brandy or wine spirits for the fortification of such wines on his winery premises: Provided, That there shall be levied and assessed against the producer of such wines a tax of 10 cents on each taxable gallon of grape brandy or wine spirits so used by him in the fortification of such wines during the preceding month, which assessment shall be paid by him within 90 days from the date of notice thereof: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as exempting any still wines, cordials, liqueurs, or similar compounds from the payment of any stamp tax provided for in this act.

Regarding the proposed amendment providing for the addition of sugar or water, or both, to the pure grape juice before or during fermentation, or to the fermented product of such grape juice, I would state that this subject is one which seems to come within the province of the Secretary of Agriculture; and it is therefore suggested that the same be referred to him for his consideration. I would, however, add that the proposed amendment as now drawn might be construed as permitting wines to be so modified on premises other than where the wines are to be fortified.

If so construed, it might become necessary to detail an officer to each winery. This, if not impracticable, would involve a very large expense to the Government in providing the necessary force of officers to supervise this work.

3. Regarding the further proposed amendment by striking out in said section 3 the following provision: "But nothing contained in this act shall be held as authorizing the manufacture of wine from any material which, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, constitutes a mash fit for distillation within the meaning of section 3282 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

I would state that this provision was inserted in the bill, on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for the purpose of preventing the use of mash fit only for distillation, which, it has been found, has been used by certain wine makers in the production of spurious wines. The use of such mash, except on distillery premises, is positively prohibited by said section 3282, Revised Statutes, and I therefore recommend that this portion of section 3 above quoted be retained in the bill.

Respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 19, 1916.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Chairman Subcommittee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAINEY: I have the honor to submit herewith for consideration in connection with the pending wine bill (H. R. 13282) statements and estimates, prepared by Representative KENT, of the production of wines, cordials, etc., and the quantity of brandy used in the fortification of wines during certain stated periods.

The statement of collections under the present wine law is found to agree with the records of this department, except as to the tax collected on brandy during the period from November, 1914, to October, 1915, which, including the month of October, 1915, is found to be $162,997.40, instead of $162,197.14, as given in the statement submitted. While somewhat less than the tax assessed on the brandy so used, the actual collections from this source, as well as the tax on the wines produced, would seem to furnish a fair basis for comparing such receipts under the present law with the estimated receipts under the proposed law.

The records show that since the enactment of the present wine law there has been a large falling off not only in the production of certain grades of wines but in the quantity of brandy used for fortifying purposes. This large decrease is doubtless due mainly, if not wholly, to the high rates of tax now imposed; and it is reasonable to conclude that, under the reduced rates of tax provided for in the pending bill, the wine industry will again assume normal proportions, and that the revenue to be derived therefrom will at least equal that now estimated by Mr. KENT.

In view of the probable increase in revenue, under the lower rates of tax, and the fact that the administrative features of the bill would doubtless prove far more effective than those contained in the present law, I regard the bill as now drawn a meritorious one, and would recommend its passage.

Respectfully, W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

The monthly reports of the Internal-Revenue Bureau show that the amount of fortification of sweet wine in August to October, 1914, was unprecedented. It is obvious that wine makers rushed fortification so as to evade the burdensome fortification tax of 55 cents a gallon, which was then being discussed.

It was assumed at that time that the next season would show a return to normal conditions, under the operation of the emergency law, as the next season's output would be unaffected by change of legislation.

Furthermore, the wines on which taxes under the emergency revenue law were collected were the product of a season which started long before the enactment of the law itself, and a comparison of 12 months subsequent to its enactment (which period, from October, 1914, to October, 1915, included the end of one normal season and the beginning of another season, an abnormal season), a comparison of receipts from mixed seasons with receipts from a normal season, is not a fair nor an accurate method of computation. The division of the year, as October to October, brings into calculations the productions of two different seasons, one of which may be extremely large and the other extremely small, and there is consequently difficulty in proving the cause of reduced production.

The law having been in effect about 18 months, the only reasonably accurate method of estimating the effect of the law is to compare the receipts of the first 12 months with the receipts of the last 12 months, and then to compare the gallonage producing this revenue with the output of an average year prior to the enactment of the present intolerable tax. Inasmuch as the past 12 months, from April, 1915, to March, 1916, inclusive, practically covers a season's production under the operation of the emergency revenue law, the production during this period as compared with the production of any season prior to the enactment of the emergency law will show conclusively the effect of the law on the wine industry.

Inasmuch as official figures are available on the sweet-wine industry only, as against the total of all other branches, the effect of the law can most readily be ascertained on this branch of the industry, as, for instance, the normal production of sweet wines prior to the enactment of the emergency revenue law was about 20,000,000 gallons, whereas during the last 12 months only 6,000,000 gallons of sweet wine have been fortified.

The tax on the sweet-wine industry was increased by the emergency law from three-fourths of a cent a gallon to about 23 cents a gallon, or approximately 3,000 per cent.

When the law went into effect it was confidently expected that 20,000,000 gallons of sweet wine would alone produce, at the rate of 23 cents a gallon (8 cents stamp tax and 15 cents fortification tax), $4,600,000. The actual collections, however, were as follows:

November, 1914, to October, 1915, inclusive.

Sales of wine stamps	$2,985,022.33
Assessments (includes penalties) on unstamped wines	28,995.57
Tax collected on brandy used in fortification	162,997.40
Total	3,177,025.30

April, 1915, to March, 1916, inclusive.

Sales of wine stamps	$2,498,276.28
Assessments (includes penalties) on unstamped wines	78,534.19
Tax collected on brandy used in fortification	307,861.29
Total	2,884,665.76

The following table shows the revenue which can reasonably be expected under the pending bill, as based on the estimates contained in the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, March 15, 1916. The revenue figures on domestic cordials, sparkling wines, and champagnes were obtained from recent letters from internal-revenue collectors, furnished through the courtesy of Commissioner Osborn, and do not pretend to be comprehensive:

Estimated revenue, exclusive of domestic cordials, sparkling wines, and champagnes	$3,684,914.00
Domestic cordials, etc. (incomplete)	653,762.43
Domestic champagnes, sparkling wines, etc. (incomplete)	103,080.96
Total	4,441,757.39

November, 1914, to October, 1915, inclusive.

Estimated receipts	$4,441,757.39
Actual collections	3,177,025.30
Difference	1,264,732.09

April, 1915, to March, 1916, inclusive.

Estimated receipts	$4,441,757.39
Actual collections	2,884,665.76
Difference	1,557,091.63

The above figures, based on incomplete returns, show conclusively that the pending bill, even though it reduces the present rates of taxation from 35 to 50 per cent, will provide an increase of revenue of over a million and a half annually.

Moreover, the bill provides a permanent tax, whereas the present law was enacted merely to provide a temporary source of revenue.

Another advantage is that with the improved administrative features of the pending bill there will be little opportunity to evade payment of taxes. Under the present law there have been discovered flagrant abuses and evasions.

It is reasonable to assume that for the next year or two there may be a slight increase in revenue under the present law over actual production, inasmuch as much of the sweet wine that is now being marketed was fortified under the 3-cent fortification tax, and the Government is collecting stamp tax on this old stock. As soon as this stock of wine is sold off (it is alleged that there were 40,000,000 gallons in California at the time of the passage of the law) it is evident that the Government will then be collecting revenue from the annual production, which will afford an opportunity of computing the actual effect of the emergency law on the wine industry.

It is furthermore evident that the Government is receiving revenue at the present time from only 35 per cent of the normal production of still wines, and unless the present rates of taxation are lowered there is no reason to hope that receipts can be increased. On the other hand, an immediate reduction of 65 per cent of production during the first year and a half under the operation of the emergency revenue law raises the presumption that, without relief, the discouragement and the fight for actual existence will tend to create a progressive decrease in production and consequently in revenue.

	Gallons.
July, 1914, to March, 1915, inclusive	17,133,228.66
July, 1915, to March, 1916, inclusive	6,051,565.49
Difference	11,081,663.17

Or a drop of 65 per cent in production.

The season of 1914–15 was divided between two rates of tax. A comparison between the season of 1915–16 and an average of the seasons of 1910–11, 1911–12, and 1912–13 follows:

	Gallons.
Sweet wine produced in 1910–11	19,498,767.24
Sweet wine produced in 1911–12	24,198,626.19
Sweet wine produced in 1912–13	19,281,758.12
Total	62,979,151.55

Average for three seasons, 20,993,050.516 gallons.

Production, 1915–16 season, 6,051,565.49 gallons, or a drop of about 72 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BRADY, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. RANSDELL answered to their names when called.

Mr. GRONNA, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. STONE, Mr. CHILTON, and Mr. PHELAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this morning I received a letter from the executive secretary of the National Retail Dry Goods Association in regard to the compensation of the members of the proposed tariff commission, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL RETAIL DRY GOODS ASSOCIATION,
New York, August 21, 1916.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We notice that it is proposed to place the salaries of the members of the new tariff commission board, the bill for which is now before Congress, at less than salaries paid to the Federal Trade Commission members.

It seems to us that this board, if properly empowered and if its personnel is of such a character as to command respect of the business interests of the country, should rank in importance with the Federal Trade Commission. If the compensation of its members is placed at less than that of the Federal Trade Commission members, we should consider such action a reflection upon the members of this tariff commission board, and this fact alone will have a tendency to keep from the board the class of men it seems necessary to secure to insure general respect and fullest success.

The National Retail Dry Goods Association therefore urges Congress not to cripple this important commission by such a course, and we sincerely hope that in its deliberations Congress will decide to provide salaries for the members of the tariff commission board at least equal to those of the Federal Trade Commission.

Very truly, yours,

NATIONAL RETAIL DRY GOODS ASSOCIATION,
E. L. HOWE, Executive Secretary.

TAX ON INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Mr. LANE. I present certain telegrams, which I ask may appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., August 22, 1916.

Hon. HARRY LANE,
Washington, D. C.:

Insurance agents and interests here consider that stamp-tax requirements are unfair, inasmuch as all other corporations have been relieved of same, and especially so in view of bill providing 2 per cent income tax on insurance corporations, which is 100 per cent increase, and the 50 cents per thousand tax on capital stock and surplus tax on insurance is a tax on the public. As citizens of Oregon urgently request you to oppose this unfair legislation.

McCargar, Bates & Lively; Hartmand & Thompson; Rodgers Hart Gibson, Dooley & Co.; Davie E. M. Dunne; Jas. McIwood & Co.; Harvey O'Bryan; Martin & Campbell; A. H. Birrell Co.; Gerlinger & Co.; F. E. Atkins; G. Rosenblatt & Co.; Pettis, Grossmayer Co.; W. G. Lloyd, Adjuster; W. J. Clemens; Wakefield, Fries & Co.; Whitmir, Kelley & Co.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 22, 1916.

Hon. HARRY LANE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I earnestly protest against prohibition of deduction of increase in reserve as basis for income tax as applied to all classes of insurance; also protest against tax of 50 cents per thousand on capital stock and surplus. And I am strongly opposed to the continuance indefinitely of stamp tax on insurance policies and ask your aid.

JAC. MCL. WOOD,
311 Railway Exchange.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 22, 1916.

Senator HARRY LANE,
Washington, D. C.:

We earnestly protest against prohibition of deduction of increase in reserve as basis for income tax as applied to fire insurance companies; also protest against tax of 50 cents per thousand on capital stock and surplus. And we are strongly opposed to the continuance indefinitely of stamp tax on insurance policies and ask your aid on these points.

LYMAN & SENGSTAKE,
511 Neuy Building.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 22, 1916.

Hon. HARRY LANE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Understanding that a bill has passed the House and is before the Senate, with modifications proposed by the Senate that have not been approved by the House, providing that there must be a stamp tax on policies issued by insurance companies, also that income tax on capital stock and surplus has been doubled, and believing that the bill is most discriminatory in that all other corporations are exempt from stamp-tax provision I urgently request that you use your efforts to oppose the continuation of the stamp-tax requirement on policies. This feature of the present law is most inconvenient and expensive, and it is a tax that must ultimately be borne by the public.

JOHN D. COLEMAN,
617 Board of Trade.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 21, 1916.

Hon. HARRY LANE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

My attention has been called to a bill which has passed the House and is before the Senate, with modifications proposed by the Senate which have not been approved by the House, to the effect that there must be a stamp tax on policies issued by insurance companies; also an income tax on capital stock and surplus and that same has been increased 100 per cent. Furthermore that this bill is discriminatory in that all other corporations are exempt from the stamp-tax provision. I most vigorously oppose the continuance of the stamp tax on policies. While this is passed along to the policyholders indirectly in premium charges nevertheless, it is because of loading charges of this kind, which are unexplainable to the general public, that insurance corporations are constantly on the defense and the object of violent legislative attacks throughout the entire country in explaining the reasons why the public have to pay the bills, all of which results in radical and extreme prejudicial legislation as against insurance corporations.

PAUL C. BATES.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 21, 1916.

Hon. HARRY LANE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Insurance interests and agents here consider that stamp-tax requirement is unfair, inasmuch as all other corporations have been relieved of same, and especially so in view of bill providing 2 per cent income tax on insurance corporations, which is 100 per cent increase, and the 50 cents per thousand tax on capital stock and surplus. As citizens of Oregon we urgently request you oppose this unfair legislation.

JAS. N. MCCUNE,
Secretary Underwriters Equitable Rating Bureau.

SALEM, OREG., August 23, 1916.

Senator HARRY LANE,
Washington, D. C.:

In the matter of Federal revenue bill I earnestly protest against prohibition of deduction of increase in reserve as basis for income tax as applied to fire insurance companies; also protest against tax of 50 cents per thousand on capital stock and surplus, and I am strongly opposed to the continuance indefinitely of stamp tax on insurance policies, and ask your aid on these points.

W. M. BURGHHARDT, Jr.

ASHLAND, OREG., August 23, 1916.

Senator HARRY LANE,
Washington, D. C.:

In the matter of Federal revenue bill I am strongly opposed to the continuance indefinitely of stamp tax on insurance policies. I earnestly protest against prohibition of deduction of increase in reserve as basis for income tax as applied to fire insurance companies; also protest against tax of 50 cents per thousand on capital stock and surplus, and ask your aid on these points.

G. F. BILLINGS.

Mr. GRONNA. I send to the desk a number of telegrams, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD. Most of them are protests against the double taxation on insurance companies.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., August 21, 1916.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

Are advised amended revenue bill provides increased income tax against insurance companies and continues stamp tax, while other lines are relieved from stamp tax. We maintain insurance second only to transportation in importance and necessity to daily business of the country, and vitally affects all individuals and business interests, large and small. As insurance men and as purchasers of insurance, and on behalf of thousands of individual purchasers of insurance, we protest against this unjust, unwarranted attack on insurance business. State and local taxes already very heavy; all efforts to decrease cost to purchaser are defeated by such unjust special taxation, which increases operation expense and cost of insurance protection. Thousands of purchasers in this State and millions in country at large are ultimate sufferers. We ask your active efforts to prevent enactment of this or other legislation the result of which is to increase unjustly insurance taxes and the cost of insurance.

Northern Fire & Marine Insurance Co.; D. M. Holmes; H. Bendeke & Co.; John C. Boe & Co.; A. H. Clifford & Co.; E. A. Fladeland; Chas. E. Garvin; E. H. Kelsey; E. J. Lander & Co.; Nelson & Forester; B. F. Brockhoff; O. A. Webster & Son; W. L. Wilder, Northern Trust Co.; Implement Dealers' Mutual Insurance Co.; Commercial Mutual Insurance Co.

NEW ROCKFORD, N. DAK., August 22, 1916.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

As representative of New York Underwriters in North Dakota, I vigorously protest against amendment to stamp-tax revenue bill as discriminatory and excessive, in view of heavy taxes now paid by insurance companies.

JOHN BOYLE, State Agent.

FARGO, N. DAK., August 22, 1916.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

Insurance Federation of North Dakota, representing all branches of the insurance world and organized throughout the State, protests against amended revenue bill. Increasing income taxation of insurance companies and continuing stamp tax on policies, while relieving other lines of insurance business, so intimately affects welfare of all people that imposition of added burden merely unjustly increases insurance cost and unfairly adds to burden of public. Letter follows. Advise us of your stand.

INSURANCE FEDERATION OF NORTH DAKOTA, By HARRY CURRAN WILBUR, Executive Secretary.

FARGO, N. DAK., August 21, 1916.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

Please exert your influence in protecting insurance companies against proposal in revenue bill to continue stamp tax on them. Alone, of all corporations, this tax cost the National Fire Insurance Co. $50,000 last year and was not borne by the policyholders, as it should have been. The National paid in taxes of all sorts last year over $400,000, which was more than our trade profit.

FARGO, N. DAK., August 19, 1916.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

Federal revenue bill, as amended by the Senate, providing increased income taxation of insurance companies and unlimited use of revenue stamps, is unjust and discriminating. Please do what you can against the measure.

THOMAS BAKER, JR., & CO.

FARGO, N. DAK., August 21, 1916.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
2219 California Avenue, Washington, D. C.:

Please exert your influence in protecting insurance companies against proposal in revenue bill to continue stamp tax on them alone. Of all corporations this tax cost the National Fire Insurance Co. $50,000 last year and was not borne by the policyholders, as it should have been. The National paid in taxes of all sorts last year over $400,000, which was more than our trade profit.

THOS. B. HULL.

BISMARCK, N. DAK., August 21, 1916.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

We will appreciate your opposition to feature of Federal revenue bill providing increased taxation on insurance companies and continuation of stamp tax, which we believe is unwarranted and unjust.

H. T. MURPHY & CO.

SPOKANE, WASH., August 22, 1916.

Senator ASLE J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

We are advised House of Representatives eliminated stamp tax on insurance. Stop Senate; committee restores stamp requirements. All corporations except insurance companies have been relieved of stamp tax. Stop this tax; is discriminatory and unjust. We urge you to use every honorable means to secure its elimination.

R. L. RUTTER,
President Western Union Life Insurance Co.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to state that I have received several hundred telegrams similar to those which have been presented protesting against the tax on insurance companies. I do not offer them, however, because every Senator has received the same messages. I think the protest in the telegrams is just.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to say that I also have received a large number of telegrams of the same character. I have refrained from putting them in the RECORD, because the RECORD is covered with such protests which are coming from all sections of the country against this provision of the proposed revenue bill.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 17375. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved June 17, 1910, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. R. 17501. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Youngstown, Ohio, to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives insisting upon its amendments to the bill (S. 6370) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HUGHES. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. HUGHES, Mr. TAGGART, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, when I yielded the floor yesterday afternoon to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] so that he could make a motion to go into executive session, I gave notice that I hoped to be able to continue my remarks this morning upon the pending bill and the resolution to commit the same introduced by me.

It is going back a good way to refer to Thomas Jefferson, and yet I suppose he still occupies his niche in the Democratic temple as the patron saint of the party. He would hardly be recognized to-day, however, and perhaps would not care to own the allegiance of those claiming to be his modern disciples. During his first inaugural address Jefferson referred to "the throes and convulsions of the ancient world" and declared that "it was not wonderful that the agitation of the billows should reach even this distant and powerful shore." Among the essential principles of our Government he mentioned "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none."

Nine months later Jefferson, in his first message to Congress, in December, 1801, although the foreign situation still interfered with the revenues of the Government, assured Congress that—

> There is reasonable ground of confidence that we may now safely dispense with all the internal taxes and that the remaining sources of revenue will be sufficient to provide for the support of Government, to pay the interest of the public debts, and to discharge the principals within shorter periods than the laws or the general expectation had contemplated.

Jefferson looked forward with confidence to dispensing with all internal taxes. His Democratic successors to-day, now in control of the Government, increase internal taxation beyond anything ever known in the country.

Jefferson believed that all revenues of the Government should be raised by customs duties. Many of his followers to-day would abolish the customhouses, and the Democratic Party, in the face of extraordinary need of revenue and the menace of an industrial invasion after the war in Europe comes to a close, keeps on the statute books the lowest tariff law in a hundred years. It has gone as far as it dares in suppressing customs duties, a policy which, as Jefferson said, gives advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures. Instead we have openly expressed admiration for British free trade and direct taxes. It is forgotten that most of the Governments in Europe are highly centralized and many of them have gone to extremes of paternal legislation. With us there still remains the fact that we have 48 great States in a Federal Union, and our Government is not entirely centralized, but much is left to these States in the way of administration and legislation, and their needs and purposes, expanding every year, require ever-increasing revenue, which must be collected somewhere. I know very well that every year there seems to be a growing tendency to ignore the States and to concentrate everything upon the Congress and the Government in Washington. I am one of those who deplore this condition. I would like to see revived, with some of its old-time vigor and vitality, those doctrines of State rights which modern Democracy seems to have entirely forgotten. This country is too big to be controlled in everything by a centralized Government. The Union covers too vast a territory, with its diversity of climate and race, to render such centralized control either practicable or tolerable; and yet, if the Federal Government is going to absorb all the revenues of the country, such absorption will only precipitate the tendency—which has been going on to too great an extent—of having the Central Government legislate and appropriate for nearly every requirement from one end of the land to the other.

We are drifting to a system of direct taxes at a time when nearly every civilized nation is going in the other direction. Before the outbreak of the war in Europe every nation in Europe, except England, had a protective tariff. Bismarck openly declared, in urging a protective tariff for Germany, that the wonderful recuperation of the United States after what had, up to that time, been the greatest war in history, our Civil War, was due to our protective-tariff legislation. If Germany had not had a protective tariff and been able to meet a large part of her requirements from protected home industries and agriculture, the war would have been over long ago, as far as Germany was concerned. And there is every reason to believe that with the close of the war new trade alliances and treaties will be made which will make it more imperative than ever that the United States should get ready for industrial preparedness. In fact, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, when colonial secretary, as early as 1903, declared in a memorable speech that under the English system of free imports Great Britain was losing both ways; the foreign markets were lost because whenever English trade assumed any size the tariff door was closed.

And, as if that was not enough—

He said—I quote his exact words—

the same foreigners who shut us out invade our markets and take the work out of the hands of our working people and leave us doubly injured.

But even now we hear every day rumors that Great Britain will completely abandon free trade and adopt protection as the result of the present war. The change will involve, it is said, the enforcement of practically prohibitory tariffs on the products of British enemies and moderate tariffs on products from neutral and friendly countries. At a meeting of the Council of the London Chamber of Commerce held on January 13, 1916, a number of important recommendations were adopted on the subject of trade during and after the war. These recommendations were made at the instigation of the special committee. In the main the recommendations provide—

For preferential reciprocal trading relations between all parts of the British Empire;

For reciprocal trading relations between the British Empire and the allied countries;

For the favorable treatment of neutral countries; and

For regulating, by tariffs and otherwise, trade relations with all enemy countries so as to render impossible a return to pre-war conditions and for stimulating the development of home manufactures and the consequent increased employment of native labor.

Attention is called in the proceedings to what is termed the "new opportunity." It is declared that the war now waged against the alliance, by stopping the great imports of German and Austrian manufactures, affords a unique opportunity for recuperating lost trade and industry. But it is urged that immediate action is imperative, so that English manufacturers may be in a position to supply the demand that must arise as soon as the war is ended. It will be impossible, it is said, however, for the English manufacturers to lay down the plant necessary to regain lost ground unless they have some guaranty that their struggling industries will not be crushed by unlimited foreign imports. The nation must therefore, it is further declared, adopt a distinct and decided policy, which should embrace the following points—I quote them, and many of them almost read as if they were taken from the speech of some Republican protectionist:

1. To secure employment and good wages for our workers.
2. To draw our revenue from foreign nations instead of taxing our own subjects.
3. To open an enormous market in our colonies and dependencies that will render us independent of foreign trade and furnish us with supplies at moderate prices.
4. To levy the following duties:

From German and Austrian and other hostile nations, heavy duties on all goods

From favored nations, moderate duties on manufactured goods and light duties on raw materials that can not be produced in our own country, such as cotton, jute, tea, coffee, cocoa, etc.

From our colonies and dependencies, light duties on manufactured goods and admission duty free of raw materials that can not be produced at home.

5. To enter into agreements with our colonies and dependencies for reciprocity and preferential treatment on the above-mentioned principles.

It is urged by the same chamber of commerce that immediate action is imperative; that it would be the height of folly to postpone preparation until the war is over; that even after the adoption of tariff reform, as above described, it would be very difficult to stem the inrush of German goods at the close of the war.

As late as June 20 last we all saw the cable dispatches relating to the action of the economic conference in Paris, in which the allied Governments of France, England, Russia, and Italy were represented by members of their respective cabinets. The conference agreed upon sweeping measures of tariff restriction to be put in force during and after the war. According to the cable dispatches during the war citizens of the allied nations are forbidden to engage in any commerce with enemy subjects. All merchandising from enemy countries is likewise forbidden. Commercial houses having enemy connections are sequestered. During the reconstruction period the allies declare their purpose to carry on joint action in restoring their industries, agriculture, and merchant fleets. All treaties with the enemy being abrogated, the allies agree that favored-nation treatment shall not be accorded to enemy powers during a number of years, to be agreed upon by the allies after hostilities cease. They further declare in favor of the allied nations dealing among themselves, so far as possible, in their natural resources.

The allies agree to prevent "dumping" of enemy goods by fixing a time during which enemy commerce shall be subject to special rules and prohibitions. They further agree upon joint collaboration after the war to procure complete independence from enemy countries relative to raw products and manufactured goods essential to the development of their economic activities. They will adopt subventions and advances to encourage enterprises and research, scientific and technical. Besides subventions and advances to certain industries, the allies will consider tariff changes and prohibitions, temporary or permanent.

Here, Mr. President, we have a proposition going further than any protectionist American statesman ever dared to go except perhaps in one or two instances. Here is an advocacy of subventions and advances of money to certain industries, together with Government research and scientific investigation, and, on top of it all, temporary or permanent tariff changes, which may be prohibitory. The mutual exchanges of goods among the allies will be encouraged by rapid transit, reduced freight rates, and common arrangements concerning postal and telegraph communication.

If such an alliance has been perfected or should be made, and should result in preventing the selling of goods of any description by the Germans, Austrians, and Turks in any of the countries controlled by the allied powers, and should such an agreement be strictly enforced, then practically the only market open to the Germans, Austrians, and Turks is the United States and South America, which means that they will be compelled to sell their wages in these countries at any price obtainable, not from choice but from necessity.

Thus it will be seen what the United States is likely to be exposed to in industrial warfare, waged more systematically than any that the country has been confronted with down to the present time. The military war in Europe will come to a close and the industrial war will begin. England, France, Russia, and Italy will practically cease all trade with Germany, Austria, and Turkey, which, in their turn, will likewise cease trade with the allies. The surplus products of these countries must find new markets.

The answer to the inquiry which will arise is found in the following quotation from the Economist, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Where are the markets which the warring nations must seek for the export of vast quantities of industrial products which heretofore have found sale in European markets? In the strain and struggle for neutral markets the competition will be the fiercest ever known. The biggest neutral market in the whole world—bigger than all the rest of the world—is the United States. The consuming power of this country in manufactured products alone amounts to more than $22,000,000,000 a year. Under protective tariffs the American people have consumed 95 per cent of American manufactured products. This tremendous total of over twenty billions of consuming power is a rich prize for the Europeans to struggle for. They are looking toward this country as their main hope of a market, as their salvation. They will not look in vain if the return of peace shall find the Underwood free-trade tariff doors wide open. They will flood our market with goods cut to the bone in prices. Of this there can be no possible doubt.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize the fact that, on account of the death and destruction which have occurred in Europe by which probably 10,000,000 men have lost their lives or been permanently disabled, it is going to make a shortage in the labor market there, and that that shortage will necessarily involve an increased price for labor; and that increased price for labor will of necessity be reflected in every article manufactured in Europe and sent to this country? Is it not also a fact that because of those conditions our European competitors will not be able to sell as low as they were selling before the war?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not agree at all with the theory of the Senator from Colorado. Recuperation after a war is wonderfully rapid. There will be plenty of men there to work the mills; and the women, too, will work in them, as they are doing now, and their products, regardless of the cost of production, will be dumped on the American market. Almost every manufacturer in this country thinks that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator also recognize that in order to pay the interest upon the enormous debt that all Europe is contracting at the present time it will be necessary to levy enormous taxation upon the factories; and, if the raw material is raised upon the land in the respective countries, also upon the land which raises the material, and that that will be reflected in the price of articles which they send to this country to compete with similar articles produced here?

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, from the manner in which direct taxes are being piled up in the United States on top of State taxation, I do not think there will be much to choose between the citizen of Colorado or of Pennsylvania running a mill and a German running a similar establishment, so far as direct taxes are concerned.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator surely does not think that the amount of taxes in the United States will be anything near as large as the taxes that will be imposed by the belligerent countries in Europe upon their land and upon their property?

Mr. PENROSE. I do think that we are the most heavily taxed people in the world, and I so stated yesterday. The Senator loses sight entirely of the fact that in the highly centralized Governments of Europe the people pay their direct taxes, and that ends it, unless there may be a poor tax or some other small local tax levy; but in America we pay taxes to the municipality, we pay them to the county, we pay them to the school district, we pay them to the State; and now the Federal Government is coming in and laying its heavy hand to require an additional toll upon a people already overburdened. I think I can prove that, in many instances, we are more heavily taxed than is any nation in Europe.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize that they have political subdivisions, just like we have in this country?

Mr. PENROSE. No; they do not. England does not have States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that they have municipalities that impose taxes, and Provinces or counties in which they impose a tax also?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And taxes on incomes.

Mr. PENROSE. Absolutely not, Mr. President. England is not split up into States with legislatures, with millions appropriated for good roads, with health departments, with a national guard, nor is Germany; and no more fatally erroneous conclusion can be reached, in my opinion, than a comparison of conditions in the United States, a federation of 48 States, covering a continent, with a little country like England or a comparatively small country like Germany.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that the counties in England have a political organization, just like the counties in the States——

Mr. PENROSE. They have a political organization, but not like the States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And that they raise by taxation the means to maintain their government, just like our States or our counties raise money for the same purpose?

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no; they are not anything like our States. I do not care to pursue such an argument with the Senator; but they have no badges of sovereignty, no legislatures, no militia, no health departments, and they do not build roads.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They have to pay for their armies and their navies by some means, and the expense is a great deal more proportionately than in our case.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senator will find that we are the most heavily taxed people in the world to-day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to call the Senator's attention to this fact: Some four or five years ago I noticed the amount of taxes imposed in this country as compared with European countries, and the statement was made that it was 5 per cent of the income that was taxed—not in the shape of an income tax, but that that constituted the total tax in America—whereas England took 10½ per cent and France took 13 per cent of the income of the country in the shape of taxes. That was compiled by a foreign writer, I think Mr. Mulhall. If that is true, of course this enormous taxation that must be placed upon the properties and factories and lands of these belligerent countries must make it a great deal more than that in the future.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the writer to whom the Senator refers was probably describing conditions prevailing under a Republican administration; but even if these countries are heavily taxed, there is no reason why we want to approximate to their condition. I do not think there is any doubt that if the Senator will take the capital invested in corporations and partnerships and other forms of investments, and pile up the different State taxes and county taxes and city taxes, and then put the top on the pyramid with a Federal tax, he will find that it compares very closely in severity with anything existing in Europe.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. President, that while we are sitting here discussing a revenue measure that utterly fails to recognize the industrial crisis confronting us and the industrial invasion which is almost certain to occur, and burdening the taxpayer already oppressed with all forms of double taxation, England has already taken long steps toward the abandonment of free trade under the pressure of war conditions; and by the time the war is about over the United States will stand naked and exposed, the only nation in the world of civilized nations practically on a free-trade basis. That is my great complaint against the pending bill—that regardless of whether we are protectionists or Democrats there is absolutely no consideration given to the question of industrial preparedness.

Early in the war England imposed a very restricted and unscientific tariff on a few articles, with the double purpose of raising revenue and restricting imports. Recently Mr. Runciman, president of the board of trade, speaking as a member of the cabinet and a representative Liberal, threw over definitely the doctrines of the late Mr. Cobden and other free-trade advocates and declared that the time had come for a radical departure in economic policy. When it is recalled that he is one of the leading members of the Liberal wing in the coalition cabinet, and, more than that, he is one of the leaders of the old free-trade party, we can realize the significance of his declaration.

Added significance is given to his statement by the fact that he is a large shipowner and has always stood in Parliament and in the cabinet for the interests of the shipowning class, who, most of all among English business men, benefited by the old system.

It would further appear that Mr. Runciman's declaration was carefully thought out and prepared doubtless in consultation with his colleagues in the cabinet. It was made in discussing a resolution by Prof. Hewins, member of Parliament for Hereford, the great English protectionist, urging the Government to enter into immediate consultation with the Dominions in order, with their aid, to bring the whole economic strength of the Empire into cooperation with its allies in a trade policy directed against the enemy.

Quite as significant as Mr. Runciman's speech was that made by Sir Alfred Mond, member of Parliament for Swansea, the great free-trade chemical manufacturer, whose own business has been protected by a series of international trade agreements. After reviewing the former predominance of Germany in the chemical and metal trades, he said:

> Our own trade will require very careful nursing after the war, with all the burden of taxation and competition with enriched America. It may be necessary for us to take steps which we think economically unsound in order to tie ourselves and our allies closely together.
> Chancellors of the exchequer require money, and very few chancellors of the exchequer will be ready to give up any source of revenue after the war.

Prof. Hewins's resolution referred to was agreed to by Parliament without a division.

Only the other day we noted in the newspapers a reference to the revolution in trade after the war and the British preparations to meet it, as outlined by Premier Asquith in the House of Commons. The premier opened the discussion of the resolutions of the Paris economic conference and declared that the British Government had entered the conference with two objects in view. The first was to convince the central powers that the entente allies were resolved to wage war in complete unity and determination in economic as well as in military spheres. The second was to prepare for the period following the declaration of peace, in view of the known German attitude and purpose. The premier said:

> Our eyes have been opened as to the meaning of the manifold ramifications of the German system of economic penetration and commercial and financial control of vital interests and the use to which, with advantage, this system could be put in time of war.

Germany, Mr. Asquith further said, would be animated with the same spirit when the war was over. The Germans were already organizing their industries for an attack on the markets of the entente allies, he declared, and for a vigorous, if possible, attack upon neutral markets.

The Germans would start with obvious advantages, the premier continues, through their action in destroying works and factories in the invaded countries, and because they had a large maritime fleet interned in German and neutral ports, and it would be necessary to make preparations for the coming of peace, and the resolutions of the conference represented the general lines upon which these preparations would proceed.

Dealing briefly with the measures proposed during the course of the war and during the period of reconstruction, the premier said it was the clear duty of the allies to take every step to secure for their own use the supplies produced by their own countries.

So far as Great Britain is concerned, he continued, the omens for the future were encouraging. British industries had shown extraordinary enterprise and resourcefulness, and there was a greater disposition among manufacturers to cooperate and call in the available scientific and mechanical resources of the country to increase the output and improve the organization.

Certain commercial changes, said Mr. Asquith, amounted to a revolution. The board of trade was engaged in a scheme to render the country independent of supplies from hostile sources in respect to dyes, spelter, and so forth. The plans for research had already been perfected.

The question of industrial and commercial policy generally has been referred to a committee, and the Government was in communication with India and with the Dominions, and the whole matter of the Empire's trade policy would be considered. The Government was in consultation with labor representatives with a view to the formulation of an after-the-war policy in social and industrial matters intended to secure a fairer distribution among all classes of the results of modern industry. Mr. Asquith said:

> The attention of the Government has been called to the fact that some apprehension has arisen in neutral countries, more especially in the United States, with regard to these resolutions, that the resolutions might be directed against neutrals. That is not the case. The resolutions contemplated only necessary measures of self-defense against economic aggression threatening the allies' most vital interests, and in carrying them into effect every endeavor will be made to insure neutrals against suffering.

This last statement of the premier is at once a candid admission and a most uncertain message of consolation. Of course, the result of these protective tariffs and trade agreements among the allies and the central powers will hurt the United States, and it is not likely that a spirit of philanthropy will prevail anywhere to save either the feelings or the interests of the people of this country. If we do not look out for ourselves and prepare ourselves we will only have ourselves to blame. It would be the height of folly to rely on assurances of any foreign minister that either our feelings or our interests would not be hurt. Even if the English Government wanted to prevent it, they would absolutely fail in preventing English manufacturers and German manufacturers from dumping their cheap products into the greatest and richest market in the world—the American market—underselling our fabrics and other manufactures, to the speedy ruin of our home industries.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. In connection with the argument the Senator is making, I should like to place in the RECORD a couple of paragraphs from an editorial in the New York Herald a few days ago. This great newspaper, which certainly can not be claimed to be a Republican newspaper, says:

> Are not the signs of the times enough to convince doubters that there will be no time for a tariff commission to mess and muddle over a situation which will require immediate statecraft? Our present tariff schedules will be no protection for this country against the vast accumulation of goods stored up abroad. Protection will be needed against the Prussians most of all. * * *
> It will not do to say that Prussia can not take the seas as her merchant marine is depleted, for that would be untrue. A greater fleet of ships than existed before the war is being built, and these will come with full cargoes, bringing in cheaply produced goods that will simply swamp the American manufacturers, who are producing at high cost of labor, material, and transportation.

That is a very important contribution to this discussion from a newspaper which is anti-Republican rather than pro-Republican.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from New Hampshire has called attention to this interesting and illuminating article.

How complete the change of policy and of theory has been brought about is illustrated by the final statement of the premier that there was no more hardened free trader than he, but no one could be so blind to the fact that this war, with its upheaval of social, political, and industrial conditions, suggested new problems and modifications in the solution of all problems.

And yet, Mr. President, in the face of these developments already occurring and with the likelihood of still more portentous aspects of trade war arising in the near future, we are called upon to pass the pending revenue measure, without any regard whatever for the menacing situation which will inevitably confront us as the war in Europe draws to a close. The only recognition occurring in the bill of such a menace is found in the antidumping paragraph. Here, again, we have an act of inconsistency similar to that which we find in the instance of dyestuffs. If a protective tariff is justified in creating the dyestuff industry, it can be argued logically that as dyestuffs are not the only articles upon which American civilization and well-being depends we might very easily extend the protective system so as to cover all articles which ought to be manufactured here regardless of any zollvereins or trade pacts or wars among foreign nations. So, if it is considered important enough to provide for the possibilities of dumping, why ought we not to go logically a step further and provide a constant, uniform, and adequate protective barrier, which will furnish a reliable and sufficient rampart against industrial invasion and dumping of cheap products and render our prosperity secure?

Realizing the inadequacy of the present tariff law to extend even a measure of protection to American industries, and apparently awakening to the necessity of providing this protection, the House committee recommended an antidumping clause. It is true that in the present tariff law the House of Representatives passed the bill containing an antidumping clause and declaring in its report that it is to—> guard the producers of the United States against the demoralization of American markets because of low-priced importations.

The clause provided, in substance, that upon imported foreign articles not upon the free list, also manufactured in the United States, a substantial duty, not to exceed 15 per cent, should be levied whenever the foreign price was less than the fair market value at home. This antidumping clause was not drawn so as to be effective. But as it was struck out of the bill in the Senate it does not require more than a reference at this time.

That was the recommendation made by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. UNDERWOOD, when he made his report upon what is now known as the Underwood tariff law. The bill as it came over to the Senate, as will be recalled by those Senators who were here at that time, did contain an antidumping clause, which was promptly eliminated by the Senate Committee on Finance. When the bill was up for consideration on the floor of the Senate an amendment was offered by myself to restore the antidumping clause to the bill, and upon a yea-and-nay vote it was defeated.

The fact that after the antidumping clause had been repudiated in one Congress by the party in power it now comes up in a very inadequate form in the pending bill is only another illustration of the continual shifting and changing of views exhibited by the various leaders of the majority. It is particularly shown in the annual report for 1915 of the Secretary of Commerce, in which he admits the necessity for legislation to provide that unfair competition from abroad at the close of the war shall not be permitted to injure American industry.

The report of the House Committee on Ways and Means declares in this connection as follows:

> In order that persons, partnerships, corporations, and associations in foreign countries, whose goods are sold in this country, may be placed in the same position as our manufacturers with reference to unfair competition, your committee recommends:
> (1) The adoption of a provision making it unlawful for a person, partnership, corporation, or association to import and systematically sell any article at a price substantially less than the actual market value or wholesale price of such article at the time of exportation, with the intent of destroying or injuring an industry in the United States, or of preventing the establishment of an industry in the United States, or of restraining or monopolizing any part of trade and commerce in such articles in the United States; and
> (2) The levying of a special and additional duty equal to double the amount of such duty upon any article produced in a foreign country and imported into this country under any agreement, understanding, or conditions, shall the importer thereof or any persons in the United States be restricted in any manner in his using, purchasing, or dealing in the articles of another person, partnership, corporation, or association.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. I understood the Senator to say that at a previous Congress he introduced an amendment relative to antidumping.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; in the last Congress.

Mr. BRADY. And the same also was rejected?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. BRADY. And at this session the Democratic majority are now trying to pass a measure similar to one the Senator endeavored to have enacted?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; somewhat similar.

Mr. BRADY. It seems, then, that they realize the necessity of such a measure as the Senator introduced in a former Congress.

Mr. PENROSE. It would seem so.

Mr. BRADY. I wish to ask the Senator whether he did not realize at that time and does not realize now that it was only a temporary measure and would not afford permanent relief to the industries of the country.

Mr. PENROSE. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. BRADY. I ask the Senator whether he thinks it would not be better at this time or as near in the future as possible to enact an adequate protective-tariff law that would not necessitate an emergency measure such as is introduced at this time?

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator is entirely right on that. The antidumping clause is not a bad thing to have in tariff legislation, but it is only a makeshift. We must have the permanent protective schedules with stringent regulations against undervaluations, and an honest and rigid enforcement of laws against undervaluation at the ports of entry. The Senator is entirely right on the question, and I am glad he has risen to drive home the point.

This antidumping clause in the pending bill is entirely ineffective and will accomplish no purpose whatever. It does not matter whether it is passed or omitted. The proviso alone destroys its effectiveness in declaring—

That such act or acts be done with the intent of destroying or injuring an industry in the United States, or of preventing the establishment of an industry in the United States, or of restraining or monopolizing any part of trade and commerce in such articles in the United States.

What an absurdity, Mr. President, to prove that some chemical trust in Germany dumping their cheap products on the American market and exterminating the American manufacturer intended to do it.

By the time that such intent was established more than likely the American manufacturer's establishment would be closed. A more effective dumping law is that one which has proved the test of time and experience and is contained in the tariff laws of Canada. It does not open the door for any discretion or for any complication of circumstances, but recites the bald fact of underselling, as follows:

SEC. 6. In the case of articles exported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in Canada be less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to Canada at the time of its exportation to Canada, there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected, and paid on such article on its importation into Canada a special duty (or dumping duty) equal to the difference between the said selling price of the article for export and the said fair market value thereof for home consumption; and such special duty (or dumping duty) shall be levied, collected, and paid on such article although it is not otherwise dutiable: Provided, That the said special duty shall not exceed 15 per cent nd valorem in any case.

I do not urge the practicability of this Canadian antidumping clause, but in its automatic operation it certainly is infinitely superior to the complicated provision which is now before the Senate.

From time to time since 1907 regulations by order in council and by the department of customs have been issued on the subject of special duty, or "dumping duty," as it is called. For some years the Canadian regulations provided that when it appeared from the invoice that the purchase price was more than 7½ per cent (or 5 per cent in case of some iron and steel products) lower than the fair market value the dumping clause should be immediately applied. For certain products no exemption allowance at all was granted. New regulations were put in force on September 1, 1914. The dumping duty was made applicable in all cases when the difference between the fair market value and the selling price of the goods to the importer in Canada would exceed 5 per cent of their fair market value.

Mr. President, as an illustration of how all over the world there is growing up this tendency to protect the home markets and home industries it is interesting to note that in 1914 the Government of the Union of South Africa included an antidumping clause in its new tariff. This clause, likewise, was modeled almost exactly after the Canadian clause.

The Australian Government, as far back as 1906, enacted legislation against dumping.

The inclusion of an antidumping clause in the pending bill is an admission of the necessity of the application of the protective-tariff principle in certain cases. The question naturally arises, If protective duties are logically applicable in emergency, why should not they be made permanent where it is demonstrated that the home product can be permanently undersold by reason of unfair competition due to foreign trusts, syndicates, and combinations, as is notoriously the case in the chemical trust in Germany or in the case of Government subsidy and Government-owned railroad systems or conditions of labor which would not be tolerated in this country. And over and above all, why should not the permanent protection be afforded when we are menaced by the prospect of tariff combinations among the nations of Europe and a general industrial invasion of our home market as soon as peace is declared?

It is argued that the task of raising revenue for the Government is a very difficult one, that it must be raised from some source or other, and the question is naturally asked, What would the Republicans do or propose were they framing a revenue measure? This inquiry will inevitably arise, and the answer to it is easily at hand. The Republicans are not responsible for the lavish and reckless way in which the public revenues have been squandered; they are not responsible, but, in fact, have generally opposed many of the ill-advised, ill-considered, and untimely projects for which millions have been appropriated and which I have already referred to.

The Republicans have endeavored at every turn to check this extravagance and to keep the appropriations within the revenues. The party in the minority at the present time is not responsible for the loss of over $100,000,000 from customs revenue by reason of the free list and the low rates of duty in the present tariff law. They view with abhorrence and astonishment the apparent recklessness in creating places and making appropriations, as if even a public treasury as wealthy as that of the United States could not ultimately be exhausted. Moreover, being in the minority, it is our duty primarily to criticize the inequalities and inexpediency of the pending measure, with the general proposition that the revenues should be primarily raised from duties at the customhouse. Under Republican administration there were ample revenues. At the end of the last Republican administration an ample balance was in the Treasury and the Panama Canal was largely built out of current revenues. We are not responsible for the fact that the Democratic Party has proclaimed a protective tariff to be unconstitutional and branded it as robbery. We are willing to fall back upon direct taxes so far as they may be necessary, but the American people in adopting the income-tax amendment to the Constitution never contemplated that this additional grant of taxing power to the Government would be exercised to destroy the protective-tariff principle, nor did they expect an income tax would be so laid as to furnish more than a fair share of revenue by supplementing revenue from customs duties and from ordinary internal-revenue receipts. They never contemplated that the whole theory and system of the Federal Government which has existed up to the present time should be overthrown and that we should embark upon the perilous proposition of a highly centralized Government with the functions of the State emasculated or eliminated and with the revenue of the country pouring exclusively into the Treasury at Washington.

Nor are the Republicans responsible for the lax method of conducting the legislative business pertaining to appropriations which has been observable in this Congress and the preceding one and shows a series of scandalous extravagance and actual loss to the Treasury in the administration of the public departments.

It is a notorious fact that in the present Congress and in the last one the appropriation bills have been invariably delayed. During this present month appropriation bills intended for the departments during the current fiscal year have been delayed well into the fiscal year 1917. This is a great embarrassment to the Government and works unnecessary expense. I have referred to extravagance. This is an illustration of shiftlessness which is a marked characteristic of the present régime.

This practice, when the Democratic Party is in power, was severely criticized by the Secretary of Commerce in his last annual report. He said:

Finally, money loss arises from failure to make appropriations in time to keep the work of the Government moving. The serious results of these latter losses are probably not appreciated. They undoubtedly amount to more than some of the economies thought to be effected by clipping estimates.

During the 16 years of Republican control preceding the present administration the appropriation bills were invariably passed before they were needed and before the beginning of the fiscal year for which they were intended, and an extension resolution was never resorted to; on the other hand, a study of the record of the appropriation bills since the House of Representatives has been under the control of the Democratic majority discloses the startling fact that 15 regular appropriation bills have failed to pass before the necessary date, and that fifteen times a resolution extending the appropriation of the previous year had to be passed. This method of appropriation is an admission of incompetency and inefficiency in itself. It causes a great financial loss in the work of every department of the Government. It complicates accounts, hinders the making of plans in advance, prevents the execution of contracts for necessary work, and prevents the allotting of funds equitably for the different seasons of the year.

Two of this year's great supply bills, one appropriating funds for the Post Office Department and the other for the Indian Bureau, failed of passage last March. All the work of preparing estimates, planning new projects, and the intelligent continuation of former works has been absolutely wasted by the failure of these bills. The affairs of those two branches of government had to be conducted under plans nearly two years old, which are absolutely foreign to conditions at the present time. A tremendous waste of time and money is inevitable, and the service that should be rendered to the public has been seriously impaired.

Thus in the present Congress the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives was compelled to report a bill extending the appropriations made for the necessary operations of the Government for the fiscal year 1916 during the month of July of the fiscal year 1917. The enactment of this bill, he declared, was made necessary because of the failure of the final passage of eight appropriation acts before the beginning of the fiscal year 1917, namely, Agriculture, Army, District of Columbia, Military Academy, Navy, Pension, Post Office, and sundry civil.

What excuse, Mr. President, can there be for such a makeshift method of conducting the legislative business of the country—to sit here all winter and keep Congress in session all through the summer until the 1st of September, and, even then, have 8 or 10 of the great supply bills not ready at the beginning of the fiscal year, and having to resort to a joint resolution continuing the old appropriations in order to keep the departments running until the bills can be acted upon? These things have never happened under Republican control of Congress, and they are a distinct admission of incapacity in managing the affairs of the Government.

Those of us who have been sitting here for a part of the summer recall that the agricultural appropriation bill was not sent to conference until July 18, considerably after the beginning of the fiscal year. I have not at hand the date when it was finally sent to the President for approval, but I recall that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry having the bill in charge left Washington while the bill was under consideration and has not appeared in the Senate since that time. The military bill was sent to conference on July 29 and only passed this body yesterday, upon the President's veto, after two months of the fiscal year for which the appropriation was intended had elapsed.

In the same way the Military Academy bill went to conference late in July; the naval bill did not go to conference until the 27th of July; and it was only a few days ago that it passed the Senate, when the conferees, after a prolonged discussion, agreed on the report, and the bill has become a law, two months of the fiscal year for which the appropriations were intended having elapsed, thus delaying the great projects contained in the bill—the building of dreadnaughts, cruisers, and other vessels of the Navy, and many other projects connected with preparedness contained therein. I can find for these delays, Mr. President, absolutely no excuse; but I find only incompetence and wasteful methods ensuing therefrom. It will doubtless be argued in connection with the naval and military bills that the delay in the matter of preparedness was the cause of the delay in these measures. But even the delay in taking up the question of preparedness is one which the American people are supposed to condemn the party in power for most severely. In this connection the President has changed his mind quite frequently, and only within a comparatively recent period has he awakened to the necessity of preparedness. We should have begun preparations for preparedness as soon as the war in Europe broke out and not awaited and postponed the inevitable problem until this late day, in the midsummer of 1916.

I have referred to the negligent method of conducting the public business and have also referred to the extraordinary expenditures which have been made without any regard to the resources of the Treasury for many ill-advised projects. I refer, in passing, to one more instance where the revenues have been depleted by improvident methods of legislation. I refer to the case now before the Supreme Court, where the court is expected to interpret the meaning of the provision in the present tariff law proposing to give a 5 per cent discount in customs duties on merchandise imported in American vessels. Thus far that clause has failed in its purpose, just as the tariff measure, of which it is a part, failed to provide adequate revenue. The question was raised immediately with the Secretary of the Treasury as to the validity of the 5 per cent discount provision. He appealed for advice to Attorney General McReynolds, who is now on the Supreme Bench. The provision was pronounced inoperative, it being declared that the 5 per cent discount to American vessels can not be given without impairing the stipulations of existing treaties between the United States and various other powers, and consequently the subsection was declared inoperative. Acting on this opinion the Secretary of the Treasury instructed the customs collectors to make no allowance of discount on duties under this provision. An appeal was taken by the importers to the Board of General Appraisers. Their ruling resulted in further confusion, and, neither side being satisfied, the case was taken to the Court of Customs Appeals more than a year after the law had passed. It is interesting to recall the report of the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee on the 5 per cent provision, when they defined it as—

> A discrimination in favor of American shipping, designed to build up our merchant marine and keep at home millions of dollars now being paid to foreign vessels to carry our products to foreign markets.

The provision in general was quite clumsily drawn and subject to other points of litigation. During the debate in Congress the Republican Members repeatedly warned the Democratic majority that, quite apart from its policy, the phraseology was meaningless and should be corrected to become effective. It was pointed out in the debate that its provisions would apply to goods coming in vessels of every country with which we had a favored-nation treaty; but those arguments were unheeded. The Government then carried the case to the United States Supreme Court. Owing to the fact that Mr. Justice Day is ill, Mr. Justice McReynolds is disqualified from passing an opinion, due to the fact that he passed on the case while Attorney General, and that Justice Brandeis has not heard the case argued, it can not be passed upon until after the fiscal year, and $25,000,000, the total of the rebates which will have to be paid out of the United States Treasury, will not appear in the disbursements for the fiscal year 1916, but will in 1917, provided the court sustains the contention that the provision is illegal.

And, Mr. President, we have the $25,000,000, which could properly be referred to in connection with this supposed refund for the purchase of the Danish Islands. I do not say that these expenditures are normal annual expenditures of the Government; that to my mind is a technical distinction; but I do say that they are expenditures that money will have to be drawn from the Public Treasury for, and that they will have to be paid out of current revenues or by bond issues. Whether they are, strictly speaking, current expenditures for the maintenance of the Government or not, or whether they are for luxuries, or the result of errors and blunders in legislation, the fact remains that they are liabilities, and I think that in the discussion of a revenue bill and in the consideration of the revenues which are likely to be had under the bill as well as under existing law, we have a right also to take into consideration everything for which appropriations have been made or for which authorizations have been made, as liabilities against those revenues; and there will not be much difficulty, Mr. President, if we take them all into consideration, in showing that neither this revenue bill nor other revenue bills will raise enough money to pay for all the unnecessary and ill-advised projects authorized by the present Congress, in addition to extravagance and waste in every direction.

Mr. President, I have some further observations to make upon the pending bill, but I will now yield the floor, as I am informed that there are other Senators who desire to address the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania has commented upon the present prosperity in this country; he has stated that it exists because of the European war, and that it is really a prosperity of manufacturers of war materials. I wish to read into the RECORD just a few statements that seem to absolutely negative his contention, and which show that the prosperity which we are now enjoying is general and unprecedented in extent in the history of this country. I desire to read, first, an extract from an editorial in the Washington Post of August 13, 1916. The Washington Post is an able, conservative, independent newspaper. It can not be said to be an administration organ, as it has opposed more of the policies of the present administration than it has advocated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not of late.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, I do not know about that; but the editorials in the Washington Post which I have in mind have been published during the past year. That paper has an editorial writer who has been collecting statistics from Bradstreet's, Dun's, and other statistical agencies, and he has produced a series of able editorials which show the condition of the country to-day and for the past year. He has abundant authority for the statements he makes. In the editorial of August 15, 1916, which I have mentioned, this language is used:

Every section of the Union—North, South, East, and West—reports unprecedented activities in every line of business affairs.

The banks of the country are in the very best of condition, with ample sums of cash at the disposal of those worthy of credit or financial support.

The manufacturers never before have had such large unfilled orders as now and never have paid out such huge sums to skilled and unskilled labor as at present.

The mining districts are swarming with men making overtime in many cases, and this at rates of pay far beyond the records of recent years.

The railway companies are making immense earnings, and their employees are now getting pay on the highest record schedules, and hoping to get more.

Mr. President, I quote from the issue of the Washington Post of August 15, 1916, an editorial entitled "Huge expansion in building operations," as follows:

The Post has several times directed the attention of its readers to the great building boom which is in evidence in every State of the Union, and which must be accepted as indubitable evidence of the prosperity of the masses of the people.

It is an evidence of financial ease, an evidence of the confidence of owners and investors in continuing good times, an evidence of expansion in the business affairs of the Union, for it means not only huge demands for all classes of materials which enter into construction but it furnishes tonnages to the transportation lines and gives steady employment at high wages to skilled workers.

Returns from all sections of the country for the month of July, received by Dun's Review from 87 centers of business, show that the permits for new construction during that month contemplate an expenditure of $103,016,666, an increase of nearly 73 per cent, as compared with July, 1915

Of this large sum the permits in the city of Greater New York involved $50,526,144, but this aggregate in the one month was occasioned by the rush to obtain permits for construction before the new law which limits the height of buildings went into effect.

We include below statistics covering the valuation records of permits issued from January 1, 1915, to August 1, 1915; also those covering the same months in the present year. It will be noticed that every month in 1916 shows a decided increase as compared with the corresponding month of 1915:

July, 87 cities	$103,016,666	$59,597,079
June, 86 cities	72,408,488	57,733,981
May, 84 cities	100,149,723	74,372,076
April, 83 cities	76,927,863	66,930,612
March, 85 cities	72,933,633	63,390,427
February, 82 cities	47,580,578	40,105,569
January, 81 cities	46,378,478	34,013,692
Since Jan. 1	519,395,431	396,143,436

The total for the first seven months of 1916 exhibits a gain of fully 30 per cent, as compared with the seven months of 1915, amounting to nearly $125,000,000 in values.

When the farm-loan banks get into practical operation huge additions to the values will be added monthly to new construction work in the United States, and material men and members of the various building trades will enjoy unparalleled prosperity.

Mr. President, if there is any indication that points clearly to the condition of business in the United States it is the building operations of the leading cities of the Union.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator that doubtless the claim of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the prosperity of the country at present is only temporary is based upon his belief that the Republicans will win in the approaching election.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, he will be mistaken in that. I do not think his prognostication will be verified. Here is an indication, gathered from statistics as to the increase in building operations during a seven months' period in more than 80 of the principal cities of the Republic, scattered throughout the entire Union. These figures show an increase of $125,000,000. In view of those figures it seems to me it is idle to talk about there being no prosperity, or to state that, if there is prosperity, it can be attributed only to war conditions. None of the materials used in building operations forms a part of the shipments to foreign countries, nor is the demand for buildings in the United States accelerated by the foreign war. There has been a great growth in the building operations in our cities in the last seven months, and it will be found that the activities in that line had been increasing on a large scale for fully a year previous to that time, the increase for July being 73 per cent, as compared with the corresponding month in 1915. This evidence, it seems to me, Mr. President, can not be questioned, and consequently it demonstrates the contention that great prosperity is here in the administration of Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. President, this morning I clipped from Bradstreet's statement of bank clearings during the week ending August 17, 1916, which I hold in my hand. It shows a gain in bank clearings of $240,418,000 over those of the preceding week, and a gain of $940,754,000 over those of the corresponding week of last year. It shows an increase of from 7.3 per cent to 69.1 per cent in the clearings of every city in the Union except Albany, N. Y. Why, Mr. President, those are gigantic figures. They indicate transactions in all lines of business. They indicate that there is activity in every branch of industry. Such enormous gains as those must of necessity demonstrate that prosperity in all branches of business exists in the United States.

Some time ago I had a controversy with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] relative to the number of failures that had occurred in the United States, and he had some statistics which he read into the RECORD which I find are not exactly in accordance with what Dun's Review gives concerning these failures. I want to put into the RECORD the number of these failures, and also the amount of the liabilities involved in them.

For the calendar year 1914 the failures were 18,280 and the liabilities were $358,053,859. In 1915 the failures were 22,102 and the liabilities were $300,680,874, a decrease of $58,000,000. The number of failures from January 1 to June 30, 1916, amounted to 9,495, with liabilities of $111,241,421, showing exactly the condition which I was contending for at that time, namely, that there were a smaller number of failures in 1916 than in 1915, and that the liabilities were enormously less.

I have calculated, according to this list, the number of failures and the liabilities for the fiscal years, because we have just had the close of a fiscal year. The number of failures for the fiscal year 1915 was 22,477, and the liabilities for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, were $361,541,664. For the fiscal year 1916 the number of failures was 18,857, showing a decrease of 3,620 in the fiscal year 1916 as compared with those of the fiscal year 1915. The liabilities for the fiscal year 1916 were $233,334,760—an enormous decrease—a decrease from $361,000,000 to $233,000,000 as between the fiscal year 1915 and the fiscal year 1916.

Mr. President, it is just as I contended at that time. It takes time for failures to mature. A man's failure may be caused by some kind of indiscreet investment or injudicious extension of credit made some years before the failure actually takes place. In fact, companies usually delay failure as long as possible; the real cause of the failure often goes back to a time three or four years before the actual failure takes place. For that reason the failures that took place in 1915, though they were large, were not caused during that year. They were caused by indiscretions in business transactions occurring no doubt one, two, three, and perhaps four years before that time.

I have heard it said as to bank failures that the banks had been in a failing condition for 10 years, and yet by reason of covering up their accounts they had not been exposed. But, Mr. President, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, we show that there are nearly 4,000 less failures than in the fiscal year 1915, and in addition to that there is a decrease in the liabilities of those failures from $361,000,000 to $233,000,000—an excellent showing in favor of the existence of good business conditions in the United States. There are always a large number of failures for fraudulent purposes, and they take place both in good and bad times.

Mr. President, these facts, it seems to me, should be sufficient to convince everyone that there is great prosperity not only among the manufacturers of war materials, but in all the occupations and industries of the land.

Mr. President, I have a number of clippings here which I desire to add to my remarks without reading them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

[Associated Press dispatch of Oct. 16, 1915.]

Dun's Review says:

"With cross currents diminishing in force, the tide of business is rising at an accelerated pace and an era of wide-spread activity is in prospect. Usually during a transition period gains are recorded slowly, but strictly mercantile conditions have passed the stage where progress is difficult of discernment, and of late industrial expansion has been phenomenally rapid. Reports from nearly all sections of the country tell of the unchecked growth of new enterprises, which, while manifest in varying degrees in different lines and locations, is everywhere stimulated by the exceptional strength of the fundamental situation. Assurance of agricultural success, together with almost unlimited financial resources, has given the commercial world the confidence essential to the development of national prosperity, and the notable improvement in some and change of spirit is now more clearly reflected in the volume of current transactions. The latter, with few exceptions, are steadily enlarging, as is evidenced by the comparisons of bank clearings, railroad earnings, commodity prices, unfilled steel tonnage, idle freight cars, and other statistical barometers."

BUSINESS CONDITIONS CONTINUE GOOD, SAYS DUN'S WEEKLY REVIEW.

Dun's Review says:

"Not only is there no step backward in general business, but each week the pendulum of progress swings over a wider area and confidence is further strengthened. Recent vagaries of weather have not been conducive to the best results in retail distribution, yet substantial gains are nevertheless apparent in this direction. The forward movement gathers momentum in spite of various opposing influences, such as the unstability of foreign exchange, the congestion of freight at terminal points, and continued dissension in the ranks of labor; and while expansion is still most pronounced on war lines, the whole conditions and prospects are much less checkered and irregular than formerly.

"Few discordant notes mar the cheerful tone of reports from the leading centers and trades, and, since popular impressions largely control events, the notable improvement in sentiment has an important bearing upon the future trend of affairs. No one now doubts that the brighter day has definitely dawned, but change of spirit finds expression in the launching of many deferred undertakings, while more new enterprises are being started than for several years past. Instead of the marked hesitancy and caution previously manifest, large projects are conceived and carried into effect in a manner that attests the increased confidence pervading the commercial world.

STEEL SHOWS THE BOOM.

The United States Steel Corporation began this month with unfilled orders for 6,165,452 tons of steel. That is the largest amount for years, and is an increase of 847 834 tons over the figures of October 1. Most of the steel is said to be for railroads, bridges, steel-frame buildings, and manufacturing. This seems to show a healthy state of general business.

BRADSTREET'S WEEKLY REVIEW.

NEW YORK, December 4.

Bradstreet's says:

"Apparently the week has been the busiest in a long time. Activity in trade as well as in leading industries is unabated—is more marked, in fact, than heretofore. Jobbers, wholesale dealers, retailers, manufacturers, and bankers are a unit in reporting activity, and sold up for months to come is the condition of numerous industries. Complaints spring from inability to get supplies and from chagrin at not having bought at lower price levels than now prevail rather than from a lack of demand.

"Incidentally, the steady demand being made for immediate shipments corroborate reports as to depleted stocks, a widespread condition. Industry swings along at an active gait, the iron and steel trade leading, with mills unable to supply demands, despite augmented capacity, while new domestic business is unchecked by higher prices. But in other industries the circuit of activity is widening.

DUN'S REVIEW.

NEW YORK, December 11.

Dun's Review says:

"There is no longer complaint of deferred buying, but of difficulty in meeting the steadily expanding requirements. Consumptive demand exceeds supply in some lines and distributing channels are obstructed by the congestion of freight, rail and over-sea shipping facilities still being inadequate to cope with the rush of traffic. This tends to act as a brake on commercial progress, yet the forward movement has not perceptibly slackened either in domestic or foreign commerce. On the contrary, exports, in spite of the shortage of vessels and other obstacles, continue in notably heavy volume, while internal trade is further swelled as the holiday season approaches. Development of Christmas business fulfills the most optimistic expectations.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY STILL MOVE BRISKLY AND PRICES ADVANCE—SUPPLIES OF MONEY PLETHORIC AND COLLECTIONS GOOD, SAYS BRADSTREET'S.

Bradstreet's to-morrow will say:

"Trade, as well as industries, still moves at a brisk pace; prices continue to advance, deliveries of raw and finished materials are complained of as slow, railway traffic is congested, supplies of money are plethoric, collections are good and buyers of some lines, fearing insufficient supplies or still higher prices, have put out orders for fall delivery. In brief, most producing units of the country are choked with orders, and instead of seeking business for far-off shipment the tendency is to move more slowly in this respect.

"There is, however, a disposition in parts of the country to proceed with caution, to ask if prices are not soaring too rapidly, and to question the ability of purveyors to obtain normal profits on final selling prices. But this recurring note of doubtfulness must be considered in conjunction with the fact that consumption is at an insatiable rate, that incomes of profit-sharing investments keep on rising, that wages as well as employment are good, and that the consuming power of the public has been greatly increased."

Bradstreet's says:

"A tale now rather commonplace is told by this week's reports. A prominent characteristic is unprecedented activity in all of the larger lines, distributing as well as manufacturing, with, however, a rift or two in the steady, easy onflow being furnished by the inclement weather retarding retail trade in the East, by growing concern over high prices, and by the less pleasant aspect of Mexican affairs. Shortage of goods, steadily climbing prices, and widespread complaints of inability to get supplies, either of raw materials or semimanufactured products or finished goods, due in part to insufficient production or lack of transportation facilities, create fears of further acuteness in this respect, but rather accentuate buying not only for filling-in purposes but for fall delivery as well."

[Extract from editorial of Washington Post of Jan. 16, 1916.]

BUSINESS STEADILY EXPANDING IN VOLUME AND INCREASING IN VALUES.

The pushing forward of extensions to industrial establishments, the increase of capacities to output in mines, mills, shops, and factories; the construction of new mills, new shops, new factories continue to be marked features of business in the United States.

The increase of wages of employees in important branches of employment of labor is an accompaniment of the expansion of outputting.

The fact that building operations noted in December, 1915, were of a value, take the country over, of more than 65 per cent increase as compared with the total of December, 1914, is most significant and speaks very encouragingly for building work during the present year.

The balance of trade in favor of the United States of rising $50,000,000 as the result of the first week of 1916 exports and imports indicates that the high tide of the last four months of 1915 is still running in full force.

The fact that exports of coal during the year 1915 were double those of 1914 tells the story of prosperity in the mining regions north, south, and west of the District of Columbia, as well as of the railways which transport the coal and the ports which are benefited by the greater commerce it brings to their people.

[Extract from editorial of Washington Post of Apr. 2, 1916.]

ENORMOUS DEMANDS OF THE PUBLIC FOR MANUFACTURERS' PRODUCTS AND MERCHANTS' STOCK OF MERCHANDISE.

As all business men well know, for the first three months of 1916 labor in every branch, labor skilled and unskilled, was employed in greater numbers of persons and in a greater percentage of the available total than ever before in the history of the United States at that period of the year. The reports of State and National officials have also shown that during the last quarter of 1915 the average wage paid was higher than at any other period of our records.

The past three months have witnessed advances in wages of employees over those paid in 1915 to an extent that has increased the daily, weekly, monthly earning power of more than 1,000,000 of our industrial workers.

Our mills, our furnaces, our factories, our shops, our manufacturing establishments, and our mines are not only crowded with employees earning good wages, but the unfilled orders upon the books of the companies, firms, or individuals controlling these are so large that they guarantee full capacity output for many months ahead, and this is in itself a guaranty of steady, constant employment to the workers, heavy pay rolls, and enormous demands for materials.

Some of the great steel companies are already booking orders for hundreds of thousands of tons of their outputs for delivery to their customers in 1917.

[Extract from editorial of Washington Post of Mar. 25, 1916.]

There are no persons idle in this country now who are capable of work and desire employment. Farms, mines, shops, mills, factories, the trades—all offer employment to persons capable of doing the necessary work, and they offer steady jobs and at wages that have never been surpassed in amount.

There never were so many people in the United States as there is at this writing; there never was so large a percentage of the population employed as there is now, and never at such continuous work and such high average scale of pay as the present moment.

With the opening of the spring the calls for labor in this country will grow more urgent, and the business activities, already unparalleled in extent, will become still more extended.

With the opening of the spring the earning powers of our 100,000,000 of inhabitants will assume enormous proportions, and this earning power carries with it a purchasing power that will increase proportionately.

If our sales to foreign countries have exceeded all expectations and broken all records, so has the purchasing power of our own people, and the best records of the retail trade in the year 1915 will be far exceeded in the retail trade of this country during the months of the year 1916.

The ability of our people to pay for what they need or desire was never equaled in our history, and our manufacturers and merchants have before them many months of huge demands for outputs and merchandise.

The masses of the people are earning above and beyond any time in the past; they have liquidated debts accumulated during the years of depression, and are now ready to use their earnings in current purchasing for their needs.

STEEL MILLS ARE CROWDED WITH ORDERS FROM RAILROADS.

The railroad companies, large and small, are still ordering rails for 1917 shipment as heavily as the mills can be induced to make sales. The manufacturers find much difficulty in declining orders from importunate buyers. Trolley lines, industrial roads, and manufacturers of frogs and switches, as well as contractors of railroad construction, also are anxiously making efforts to secure places on rail-mill schedules before May 1.

In the past week contracts for light and heavy sections, reported specifically, amounted to nearly 150 000 tons, including 30,000 tons for the Great Northern, 28,000 tons for the Southern Railroad, 12,000 tons for the Chesapeake & Ohio, 6,000 tons for the Clover Leaf, 15,000 tons for the Pere Marquette, and 3,700 tons for the Lake Superior & Ishpeming. Four southern roads bought an aggregate of 35,000 tons standard sections. There were also orders of girder rails and light sections aggregating 16,000 tons. Since the 1st of April rail contracts have amounted to nearly 800,000 tons.

NEW HIGH RECORDS BY BANKS—RESOURCES IN CENTRAL RESERVE AND RESERVE CITIES $8,000,000,000.

Resources of nearly $8,000,000,000, a new high record, were held by national banks of the central reserve and reserve cities of the country on May 1, Comptroller Williams announced last night. He issued this statement:

"The abstract of condition of all national banks in the central reserve and reserve cities as of May 1 shows that their resources have reached another high-water mark, total resources being reported at $7,976,000,000, an increase of $259,000,000 over the call of March 7.

"The deposits in these national banks were $6,593,000,000, an increase of $249,000,000, while loans and discounts increased only $48,000,000, or from $4,164,000,000 to $4,212,000,000 on May 1.

"In the central reserve cities of New York, Chicago, and St. Louis deposits increased $180,000,000, while there was an actual reduction in loans for the period of over $24,000,000.

"In reserve cities deposits increased $62,000,000, while loans increased $73,000,000."

BIG SOFT-COAL OUTPUT—RECORD ESTABLISHED IN FIRST SIX MONTHS OF THE YEAR—261,000,000 TONS ARE MINED—INCREASED CONSUMPTION BY RAILROADS AND IRON AND STEEL INDUSTRIES GIVEN AS CAUSE IN GEOLOGICAL SURVEY REPORT—EXPORTS INCREASE 10 PER CENT OVER LAST YEAR.

Bituminous coal production in the United States during the first half of the present year was the greatest ever recorded in any half-year period, the Geological Survey announced last night. Estimates by the survey put the six months' output at 261,000,000 tons, a 35 per cent increase over the first half of 1915 and a 5 per cent increase over the last six months of that year.

The amount mined in the six months' period exceeds by several million tons the record production of the first half of 1913. Increased consumption by railroads and the iron, steel, and other industries is given as one cause of the increased output.

Exports in the period given were about 10 per cent greater than in the corresponding period of the year before. Movement of coal through the Soo Canal shows an increase of 80 per cent, and coal used in coking has increased about 50 per cent.

EXPECT STILL LARGER OUTPUT.

"From April, 1915, to January of this year production increased at a rapid rate, with but temporary slackening due to car shortage," said the survey's statement. "The output in January, 1916, was more than 60 per cent greater than in April, 1915, and the production in February and March this year was nearly as great.

"Users, fearing shut-downs on account of labor troubles, laid in large stocks, and the production in April declined, but May and June showed successive increases, and there is every indication that the production during the coming six months will equal, if not exceed, that of the six months just past and that the output for 1916 will exceed 500,000,000 tons, establishing a new record."

HIGH PRICES FOR WOOL—35 CENTS PAID IN MONTANA FOR CLIP OF 30,000 POUNDS.

BOSTON, July 6.

The American Wool and Cotton Reporter says:

"Considerable activity is noted in the wool market, with a great demand for medium scoured and fine wools for Government purposes. Speculation has also been a feature of the market. Wools suitable for blanket purposes have experienced a little flurry. Practically all the old territory wools have been disposed of.

"Record prices for the season, and, in fact, for a number of years, have been paid for wool in the primary market. In the West wool dealers saw their way clear to meet the price ideas of the wool growers. As high as 35 cents is reported to have been paid in Montana for clip of about 30,000 pounds. It is estimated that there is still approximately 20,000,000 pounds unsold in the West."

NEW YORK, July 27.

Simultaneously with the publication of the statement by the Secretary of the Treasury, William G. McAdoo, in which he directed attention to our continued prosperity and banking strength, there appeared a list of 20 of the largest banks in the world, each one having deposits in excess of $200,000,000. Secretary McAdoo's statement is probably without parallel. No financial minister of any other nation, so far as brief research reveals, has been able to make a statement that compares with this.

Even in the financial district, it has caused much comment, probably because there they are so near the conditions set forth by Secretary McAdoo that it is impossible fully to realize them.

[From Washington Times of July 2, 1916.]

TREASURY BALANCE LARGEST SINCE 1908—M'ADOO REPORTS UNCLE SAM HAS $174,965,231, AND ENDS 1916 WITH $78,737,810 SURPLUS.

Secretary McAdoo reported last night that the balance in the United States Treasury is $174,965,231.97, the largest since 1908. The surplus for 1916 was $78,737,810.11, as compared with 1915's $59,436,580.15 deficit.

Income-tax receipts mounted from $79,000,000 to $124,867,430.28; internal-revenue receipts increased phenomenally to $512,740,769.58.

POSTAL SURPLUS $5,742,445—AUDITOR MAKES REPORT TELLING OF BIG IMPROVEMENTS IN 1916.

The Auditor for the Post Office Department yesterday reported an audited surplus of the department for the fiscal year 1916 of $5,742,445, according to a statement given out yesterday by the Postmaster General. The announcement of this result at this time is the earliest date in the history of the Postal Service that such a report has ever been made, and is due to improved system of accounting and the high standard of efficiency among postmasters, which the auditor reports as being "higher at present than at any time during the past quarter of a century."

During the four years of this administration the Postmaster General has paid into the Treasury $12,500,000, being a net gain to the general revenue of $1,162,061.

"This successful handling of postal finance by this administration has been brought about," says the report, "while at the same time it increased the number of rural routes and extensions by more than 10,000 and the number of people served on rural routes from 23,278,290 to 26,307,685.

"It has also extended the City Delivery Service to more than 5,000,000 additional patrons of the post office, including 243 cities which heretofore had never had free delivery, and it has increased its mail transportation by service on 6,248.09 miles of railway." Moreover, "it has several times increased the weight and size limit and twice reduced the rates on parcel-post matter.

"The delivery by automobile and other conveyances has increased in three years by 17,484,408 parcels, or 100 per cent, at the 50 largest offices in the United States. It also developed and simplified the Postal Savings System so as to increase the number of deposits from 310,000 to 616,000 and the amount deposited from $30,036,325 to over $92,000,000.

"The postal efficiency at this time is higher than was ever known in the history of the service."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in connection with the admirable presentation by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] of the condition of prosperity, which extends all over our land, I think it would be well at this time to add also a statement of our exports and our imports for the past four years. These figures are as surprising and as gratifying as those presented upon other lines by the Senator from Colorado. I hold in my hand a letter from the Department of Commerce. The exact figures, as furnished in this letter, I ask to print in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Fiscal year ended June 30—	Imports.	Exports.
1913	$1,813,008,234	$2,465,884,149
1914	1,893,925,657	2,364,579,148
1915	1,674,160,740	2,768,589,340
1916	2,197,883,510	4,333,658,865

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. These figures show that our exports for 1916 were $4,333,658,865. Mr. President, you may deduct all of the munitions sent abroad, and still our exports will remain the largest in the history of the country.

I always regret partisan debate or partisan consideration of questions that come before the Senate. I have scarcely ever participated in a partisan debate. But, Mr. President, we have heard for the past few days, under the leadership of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], criticism of the financial condition of the Treasury and of our revenue collections and our appropriations, which were the action of both Houses of Congress. These criticisms were intended evidently not to aid in perfecting legislation, but for political purposes. As we may naturally expect the regular Republicans—or, as they are usually termed, the "standpatters"—to adhere solidly to Mr. Hughes, and as the debatable class of our citizens are called Progressives, and as both sides are seeking the support of this part of our people, I take it for granted that the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah are seeking by their speeches upon this subject to make an appeal to that class of their fellow citizens.

For the past three years or more we have been hearing a wail from the other side of the Chamber about deficient revenue bills passed by Democrats, and excessive appropriations made by Democrats. So far as the appropriations were concerned, there were few of them—none until just at this time that I recall—which did not receive the support of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber equally with the Senators on this side of the Chamber.

But, Mr. President, I have requested the Treasury Department to furnish me a statement of revenues collected and disbursements made for the past four years, starting with 1913, the last year of Republican administration, and following on down to the present time. I ask that this statement may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOTE.—Figures for 1916 subject to slight change after final revision of accounts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I call attention to the fact that in spite of the prophecies of evil which have come from the other side of the Chamber, we have the gratifying result for the fiscal year 1916 of an excess of all receipts over all disbursements, amounting to $74,320,147. The prophets of evil were mistaken. Their lamentation it was necessary to make in advance, because it could not be presented as a criticism afterwards.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator realizes, does he not, that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report submitted to this Congress, estimated that there would be a deficit for the year ending July 1, 1916, of $64,000,000?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When?

Mr. CURTIS. December 6, 1915.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, it is gratifying to find that the Secretary of the Treasury, in anticipation of conditions, caused us to realize through additional legislation a most fortunate result, better even than he had hoped.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to the Senator for a question, but not for a speech or for any comment.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to ask the Senator if, instead of the surplus being the amount given by the Senator in the statement made a minute ago, whether the excess of ordinary receipts was not $55,000,000 instead of the seventy-odd million dollars given by the Senator, not excluding Panama Canal or public-debt transactions?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator. My statement was absolutely accurate, and the statement which I have already put into the RECORD shows that the excess of ordinary receipts over ordinary disbursements was $55,270,391, while the excess of receipts over all disbursements from all sources was $74,320,000, the figures that I gave.

I have given for publication in the RECORD an accurate and exact statement of the figures for each one of these years, furnished by the Treasury Department, and I am simply commenting upon some of those figures, which will appear in the RECORD. It is certainly a gratifying result that the last year of the Democratic administration, in spite of the prophecies of evil, in spite of the wail of woe in advance, left in the Treasury over $74,000,000 of additional surplus.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For a question.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator deny that nearly all of that came from enormous profits in the sale of war materials?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I deny it. The Senator has his answer.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senator will have hard work making anyone believe that they came from any other source.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I decline to yield for anything but a question. The Senator can ask me any question he wishes.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the appropriations for 1917. We have heard the most remarkable statements from the two great leaders of the Republican Party, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. We have heard the facts that they have presented, by which they expect to win the Progressives of this country in support of their candidate whom they selected and nominated at Chicago. I desire to take up the appropriations and discuss them somewhat in detail. I have a statement from the Treasury Department which I had intended to put in the RECORD, but as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] put a statement from the Treasury Department into yesterday's RECORD I will base my discussion upon that statement rather than upon the statement which I have, which is made up in somewhat different form.

The statement is as follows:

Shipping bill, bonds authorized	$50,000,000
Nitrate plant, bonds authorized	20,000,000

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 18, 1916.

The leader from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] talked about $2,000,000,000 as the appropriations for 1917. That statement from him was ludicrous. I want to know what appropriations he has been opposing here. I will discuss later on two or three that he has opposed. I do recall now the appropriation for the armor-plate plant, which the Senator from Pennsylvania attacked aggressively. Oh, what a leader he is to appeal on this subject, against our action, to the Progressives of the country! What power and what persuasive influence his utterances upon this subject will have to capture the Progressives for his candidate!

But, Mr. President, I do not desire to digress. He talked on this estimate about buying the Danish Islands. Did he say he would vote against buying them? I do not know whether I will vote in favor of buying them. I do not know whether we will ever have a chance, because it looks as if the Danish Government will not confirm the treaty. But if he votes to buy them, what kind of sincerity is there on his part in criticizing an appropriation bill that contains an item to pay for them because of the increase made by the payment?

I do not think that is the kind of conduct that will appeal to the Progressives. It might suit Pennsylvania politics, but not the liberal thinking men of the land.

The Senator from Utah puts his figures at $1,700,000,000. He was something over $50,000,000 too high. He did not, however, I must say, give that as a definite figure; it was in the nature of an estimate without the exact figure.

Mr. President, the Treasury statement shows appropriations for 1916 and 1917, including the Panama Canal, $1,572,000,000.

The Senator from Utah will say that this does not include a deficiency bill for the next Congress. I will admit that, but it does include the deficiency bill that was passed for 1916, and the two will balance each other. I do not add a deficiency bill which will pass the next Congress, but if I did would deduct something over $25,000,000 for the deficiency bill passed for 1916, contained in the statement above. One of the two should not be in the estimates for 1917. The figures $1,572,000,000 are fairly accurate and cover appropriations for 1917. I grant they do not include two items to which the Senator from Utah referred, one $50,000,000 authorization of use of bonds for the purchase of vessels under the ship-buying bill, the other $20,000,000 authorization of use of bonds for the erection of a nitrogen plant. It is utterly immaterial whether you add these two items as a part of the appropriations or whether you deal with them separately as an authorized bond sale, so far as I am concerned, for we have authorized the bond issue for these purposes. I am willing to go with the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah to the Progressive voters of this country, and ask them whether they will follow these two great old-line Republicans against the ship purchase and against the nitrogen plant, or whether they are not in favor of both.

But now we are told that it will be very expensive and almost impossible to buy the ships. I think that is possibly true, and I think the purchase may necessarily be deferred for some time; but why was it deferred? Why did we not make the purchase more than 12 months ago? It was because of the almost solid vote of the other side of this Chamber, backed by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah, in preventing it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The postponement of it enabled the Democratic Party to present a very different bill from what they did a year ago.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But if they had been bought a year ago by a bond issue, they would have more than paid for themselves before this time. We would have them as an asset, with the money turned back into the Treasury which they cost. The filibuster led by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah prevented the Government and the people from owning the vessels to-day, and from having earned their cost before the present time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think they could have purchased or built those ships in the last year?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. At the time the bill was pending, if we had been allowed to pass it at once, I know we could have then bought vessels and put them at once to work at less than half what we would have to pay to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no authority for that except the Senator's statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I furnished in the RECORD then, I will say, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury pointing out vessels entirely other than the German vessels in New York which he had in contemplation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator recall the fact that the filibuster he speaks of could not have been successful except for the aid of Democratic votes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would have been successful without it. There were only seven Democrats who joined you. Those men did no filibustering. The filibustering was done by the Senators on the other side, and day after day and day after day Senators on your side of the Chamber wasted time to prevent us from voting. It is true that seven of our colleagues finally voted with you, but we had the votes to pass the bill without them by the aid of certain Progressives. Except for the fact that the Senators on your side would not let us vote, the bill would then have become a law.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say further that we had every assurance—and I have not a question in my mind about it at all—that we could have built those ships, a ship of 8,000 tons, within nine months. We had propositions to that effect. The ships could have been built and they would have been worth twice as much to-day as they were then.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The responsibility for the Government not owning those vessels to-day, paid for from the profits of their use, rests upon the leadership of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah.

But what will these vessels be? They will be a necessary adjunct of our Navy. They will be essential to round out the Navy. They are essential as a matter of preparedness, if we are to use that term. I have no question they can be leased out to private companies for use in a manner that will pay 4 per cent on the investment and pay back the original cost. It may be that we will be compelled to use some of them upon the Pacific.

I am deeply interested in the development of our trade with China. I do not believe there is in the world a broader field for trade development and I am opposed to having our trade go through Liverpool. I am in favor, if the Government must build the vessels, of direct trade from the ports of the Atlantic and the ports of the Pacific to the ports of China, and I am glad we have enlarged our Navy and will have a Navy strong enough to see to it that our commercial vessels are always free to travel from the United States to the ports of China.

I wish to know if the Republican Senators believe they will make any Progressive votes by their attack upon the ship-purchase bill.

I take up the nitrate plant. What is it for? To-day we are absolutely dependent upon Chile for the basic material of the bulk of our powder. If we were cut off by the vessels of any great power from communication with Chile before we had built a nitrate plant, we would be almost helpless. It is utterly impossible to say that our country is prepared to sustain itself in a contest with any other great nation of the world unless we are ready to produce through a nitrate plant the necessary raw material for our explosives.

I would rather have cut $20,000,000 off of our shipbuilding or cut off nearly any other branch of our preparedness that much than not to have taken the step to have in our own country a nitrate plant which will make us independent of Chile in producing our explosives.

I am willing to go to the country with the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah and leave that issue to the Progressive voters.

Mr. SIMMONS. All voters.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am talking about the Progressive vote. I stated when the Senator from North Carolina was out of the Chamber that we are contesting for those votes; that the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah, good politicians as they are, having nominated their candidate at Chicago can rely on standpat Republicans and they have their hooks out to catch the Progressives, and naturally I have a right to judge that the political speeches they are making here are intended as appeals to the Progressives. I simply want to tell them, as I just now did, that as to the shipping bill and the nitrate bill, if they can make anything out of those measures with which to catch the voters they are after, they are welcome to them.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to go on with the consideration of these figures. I have eliminated the shipping bill. That is an authorization to issue bonds. I have eliminated the nitrate plant. That is the same. If you consider them as appropriations then I have disposed of those two items of appropriation in a manner which I think will be satisfactory to the bulk of the independent voters of the country. That leaves us $1,572,000,000 in the appropriation bills. But these figures include the sinking fund of $60,727,000 and the Post Office appropriation of $325,744,000. The sinking fund is not an expenditure and it is always eliminated in calculating expenditures.

I come to the Post Office appropriation, which is $50,000,000 more than the appropriation of 1913. But let us see about the Post Office appropriation. That is not consumed. That is the money incident to the operation of our great business enterprises carried on in the interest of the people of this country. Why this $50,000,000 increase? Because the Democratic administration has given the country a genuine parcel post, and because the growth and the development of the parcel post as well as the balance of the post-office service required this sum for 1917. But it would be entirely misleading to suppose we were consuming this money from the Treasury. The last year shows that the Post Office Department netted $5,700,000 from its operation. The figures that I have in my hand furnished me by the Treasury Department states the net at $5,700,000.

When we appropriate money for the Post Office Department we do not consume the money paid into the Treasury by the taxpayers; we only provide for the operation of this great public-service organization. Last year at this time the Secretary of the Treasury feared a loss, but before the year was out there was a net of $5,700,000. The post office has to turn into the Treasury its receipts. This is an authorization to draw them out. All the post-office receipts are deposited in the Treasury, and our appropriation allows them drawn upon for operation expenses. I have no doubt that the Post Office Department will again this year net a profit.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator says he is willing to answer questions?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think my memory is accurate when I say to the Senator that in a debate a little time ago on the Rural Delivery Service the Senator condemned it, and his colleague condemned it, and they said it was so badly administered that if Georgia was not so strong a Democratic State it would go Republican at the next election.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not go that far.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator's colleague did.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I was just going to refer to the mismanagement of the department in certain parts of its rural service during the past year.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad the Senator is going to do that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am going to mention the fact that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General undertook to force into my State automobile service where the roads were not suited to it. But the Democratic Party is able to protect the people from difficulties of that kind, and in the bill we passed we have thrown restrictions around his discretion in that respect, so that local opinions that the roads are suited to the service will be necessary in future before such changes can be made. The difficulty we had from too keen a purpose to introduce automobile service has been prevented by legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the automobile part of the controversy may have been somewhat corrected, but the disruption of the service, which was notorious the country over, has not been corrected.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I referred to the subject only as it applied to my own State, and I know that corrections have been made of the mistakes. Inspectors unfamiliar with local conditions had undertaken to advise automobile service over roads that were unsuited to it. We have succeeded now in getting those matters adjusted and the service restored, and I have no doubt this has been done everywhere. You occasionally have a man in a department here and there who is a little too smart for the place. I remember that the last Postmaster General under Mr. Taft, Mr. Hitchcock, was so much too smart for the place that he was not admitted before the Post Office Committee of the Senate to give counsel, though the committee was Republican. We can not help that in our system. It is the duty of the legislative department to check men who get a little brash in the executive departments, and I am always glad to join in such a course.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have wondered what has happened to the Democratic official who was very brash before the committee a while ago, and we were told that he was going to be removed because of his brashness.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator was not told by me.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was told by a Democratic Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know. Very frankly, if I had had charge of it I would have fired him. I let the Senator have the benefit of my view on that subject. But you can not conduct an administration without an occasional situation of that sort. It is hypercritical to pick out a little thing of that kind and undertake to make a national disturbance over it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. POMERENE. I should like to see justice done in these matters.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. I was going to make a statement which will take me two minutes, but I will not insist.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to the Senator, though I objected, on the other side, to a statement. I yield because I do not wish to leave an unjust criticism on anyone.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply wanted to make a statement that ought to go in the RECORD. We had our difficulties in Ohio over this motorizing of the routes. I took this matter up with others of my office force with the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. Every courtesy was extended to us. My investigation showed that in my own State there were in the neighborhood of 300, and perhaps more, of the rural-route carriers who covered their routes in less than four hours, many of them in less than three hours. The purpose of the department was to reduce the expenses of the department and to increase the number of people who might be served. Of course, if that could be done without in any way prejudicing the service which was to be rendered to those who had been served by the department for some years before, no objection could be seriously made thereto.

Necessarily, when it would come to the working out of a plan of this kind the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General would have to depend very largely upon the subordinates in his department. There were something over 140 subordinates in that department, and 95 per cent of those subordinates were Republicans. So if there is any fault to lie with that department for what it did or failed to do, it is in large part administrative, and was due to the subordinates quite as much as it was to the man who was at the head of the department.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The statement of the Senator from Ohio is no doubt correct, and yet I do not exonerate the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. I condemn him for putting Republican strangers into my State and taking their reports about the feasibility of routes when I, familiar with the facts, presented statements from men locally who understood, and which he would not heed. I think when a department assistant gets so big that he can not receive advice from the Senators of a State representing the people on a subject of this kind the place is better filled by his absence.

Mr. President, I do not intend to be diverted from my discussion of the splendid record of the Democratic Party during the past four years in the administration of the finances of the Government to consider a matter so unimportant as a Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. I want to go on with a discussion of these figures. I want to take from them the misleading effect of their use as they have been presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah.

I have shown that the total appropriation in 1917 was $1,572,000,000. I have shown that $60,000,000 of that was for the sinking fund and $325,744,000 for the Post Office Department, neither of which is considered in estimates of appropriations. They are always eliminated in final calculations of the appropriations for the expense of the administration of the Government.

The Post Office appropriation is an authorization to use in the operation of the Post Office Department money which the Post Office Department will take in and turn in to the Treasury. The other is the standing appropriation for refunding the Government's indebtedness.

Deducting those two figures from $1,572,000,000 we have $1,185,000,000, the appropriation for 1917.

Now, how much of that is for preparedness, added for the coming year by the call of the people of this country? I do not concede that it was supported more earnestly by Republicans than by Democrats. No Republican was more for it than I was for it. I believed in strengthening the Army and I believed in strengthening the Navy, and I voted for every dollar of those appropriations, and I am proud of it.

But how much extra did we put on for that reason? Three hundred and ninety-one million dollars. The Senator from Utah concedes $390,000,000. The exact figures are a little over $391,000,000. Do the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah expect to fool the Progressives of this country? Do they expect to deceive them into believing that there has been reckless Democratic extravagance in that appropriation? If not, why have they not frankly deducted it and come down to the real figures?

The only criticism that the great colonel would make would be that we had not appropriated enough. He would probably have doubled it. Are his followers to line up at once behind the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah with wild huzzas in condemnation of the Democratic administration and the Democratic Congress because the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah attack our appropriations as being extravagant? Honesty and candor require that they deduct this amount, which they voted for and conceded was right, and in the handling of appropriations come down to the normal appropriations.

When we deduct that amount we have left $794,000,000. Why do they not talk about $794,000,000 and be frank? Ah, I warn them that the Progressives are not a class of men to be captured by misleading statements, even though handled by the two great leaders of the party, the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah.

Now, let us think a little about some of these items. Six million dollars of the increase is for good roads to help stimulate the development of good roads all over the United States, to cooperate with the States, to furnish knowledge of how roads should be constructed, to aid in their selection, and to contribute something toward their construction.

A good road in Virginia is a matter of interest and value to a resident of Maryland or of the District of Columbia. The good-road problem is, in a sense, a national problem. What we have done has been to provide a wise cooperation between the Government and the State, to stimulate the construction of good roads. I want the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah to attack that appropriation and to go to the Progressives on it.

Another appropriation is $6,100,000, estimated, in 1917 for rural farm-loan associations. This is an effort to bring down the rate of interest that the farmers of the country pay. It is an effort to collect their various mortgages, to put them together, in an organized way to pass upon their titles, and to give the indorsement of the farm-loan organization to titles, to watch the collection of the mortgages and the interest in an organized way, and to raise the money by issuing bonds—bonds of the association—which are secured dollar for dollar by mortgages on farms, put in a shape where they will be an attractive investment for the average investor, who simply desires a reasonable rate of interest and no care or doubt about the certainty of the payment of the principal. It is an organization to eliminate the doubt about the security offered and to transfer the responsibility of collection to the organization.

I have no doubt it will bring down from 2 to 4 per cent, and perhaps more, the rates of interest now paid by the farmers of the country on their mortgage loans. It is estimated that they carry $4,000,000,000 of farm-mortgage loans. It will help the small farmer to pay for his farm; it will help the small farmer to develop his farm; it will help build up rural life; it will help strengthen that great body of our people—the very backbone of the Nation. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], who honors me with his presence, feels no deeper interest in them than do I. Will anybody question the advisability of that appropriation of $6,100,000? I do not think so.

A part of this increase is for agricultural extension work, carrying the work of the agricultural colleges and of the experiment stations to the homes of the farmers, in order that those who have not been able to attend the agricultural colleges may have laid down at their doors by demonstrators, by masters of the subject, that information which for 50 years we have been gathering in the agricultural colleges, for 25 years in the experiment stations, and for more than 25 years in the Agricultural Department. That expenditure amounts this year to something like $6,000,000. I have not the exact figures before me. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Utah go to the Progressives of this country and attack that increase?

Ten millions of the increase is for river and harbor increases over last year; but when I turn back to 1913 I find that the Republicans then appropriated as much for rivers and harbors as the Democrats have appropriated at this session. Frankly, I think there ought to be a little more critical examination of river and harbor bills. I think that the bulk of the items in those bills are good, but I think considerable trash gets into them. I think trash got into the bill in 1913, when the appropriations were as big as they now are, and I have no doubt there is some trash in the bill which we have passed at this session. I believe that we ought, without regard to parties, to study the question and thin out the trash. Legitimate and proper river and harbor appropriations ought to be made; but no money should be spent except where real substantial benefit can be shown, not simply to the locality from having the money spent but from the results to be brought about by the expenditure.

Mr. President, the expenditure last year being $729,916,000 and the increase being about $54,000,000, if you will go through the various bills and hunt for the places where the increases occurred you can easily find them. One was in the District of Columbia, amounting to nearly $2,000,000. What Republican opposed that expenditure? One was a million and a half dollars, in round numbers, increase for the Diplomatic Service, an expenditure caused by the increased burden placed upon the State Department growing out of the international war. So we will find them; so they come down; so we pick out items bringing the total almost down to last year's appropriations. Nobody can criticize them. Where are the items in those differences that the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah criticized when they were being made? Where are the speeches they made against them as they were going through?

Ah, Mr. President, it would be almost as high a service to watch the appropriations as they came along, and, if they were improper, to criticize them then as it is after they have been passed to seek to arouse party prejudice against them when you did nothing but vote for them as they passed along.

I realize, however, the exigency that confronts these two great statesmen and great party leaders. They have named their candidate; they have picked him and put him over with adroit skill; and now the burden is on them to elect him. There stands off the Progressive vote of the country, and the responsibility falls upon the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah to corral the Progressive vote. What a delightful task is theirs! The Progressives in many ways are a splendid body of men, sometimes misguided, but earnest and patriotic in their purposes.

I am not afraid to submit fairly, item by item, the record of the Democratic Party to them and to let them vote on it. I will do it, and willingly do it, despite my recognition of the tremendous influence, so justly and deservedly exercised, by the Senator from Pennsylvania and by the Senator from Utah upon the Progressives.

Mr. President, I have some additional remarks which later on I shall present on this bill, but for the present I do not desire to discuss this feature of the measure further.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, unless prevented by the act of God or the public enemy, I shall draw on old Father Time for probably at least a couple of hours. I give due and timely notice to the brethren in the Senate, so that they may conduct themselves accordingly if they have other and more important business elsewhere.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. I simply desire to request that the Senator speak loud enough so that we may all hear him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I shall endeavor to make my Republican friends, as well as my Democratic ones, hear what I have to say. Whether I shall convince all of them or not I can not guarantee, Mr. President, especially as to those on the majority side of the Chamber.

I am unable to state, and I shall not undertake to solve, Mr. President, the cause of the alleged Democratic prosperity. In a very certain way I have my suspicion, but probably this condition is incapable of mathematical demonstration to my perverse neighbors of the majority. Whether the prosperity is due to the Federal Reserve System, or the Federal Trade Commission, or the rural-credits legislation, or the resignation of William J. Bryan, or the distribution of post offices, I am unable to say. This wave of prosperity might be caused by any one or more of them, as it affects those fortunate enough to hold some of the appointments. Those who have received the benefits, I am sure, would think that the country was in a very prosperous condition.

We are, however, accused of worse things than misrepresenting the cause of prosperity, Mr. President. It is said that a year or so ago we prevented the passage at that time of a merchant shipping act. Well, in so far as I could contribute to that end, I did so, and I take my full share of blame with the minority side of this Chamber. Thereby the delay, it is suggested, caused the increase in the price of shipping and the cost of construction. If we had permitted, say, in the late winter or early spring of 1915, the passage of the shipping bill, we could have built or bought or leased, it is charged, probably twice as much in the way of tonnage as we shall be able to do under this $50,000,000 appropriation—this summer's appropriation—passed at this first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

The argument, however, carried out to its logical conclusion, proves more than the Senators anticipate. I have heard the principle announced and the specific application of that principle applied to those who are primarily responsible for the defeat of the shipping bill. I shall not content myself, Mr. President, merely with stopping with the particular application made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]; I will carry it somewhat further.

Preparedness has cost us a round sum of money, running into many millions of dollars, and the minority side of the Chamber, along with the majority, take their full share of the responsibility that attaches to the passage of appropriations having that object in view, but if we are responsible for the increased cost of merchant shipping by delaying the passage of the shipping bill at the last session of the Sixty-third Congress, with the constantly increasing price of everything, likewise our brethren on the majority side of the Chamber are responsible for the greatly increased cost of preparedness.

I remember full well certain messages delivered by the Chief Executive. In one message he took occasion to remark that, while the Old World was disturbed with war, we happily had peace. There were some nervous and excited souls, he said, who wished to prepare and to spend considerable sums of money in military and naval increases; but he suggested that no such appropriations were needed; that we were at peace, and would remain at peace; that we were, in substance, the masters of our own destiny in the New World; that, however the fields of Europe might run red with war, this Republic would remain at pence with all the world, including even Mexico.

The Chief Executive suggested further on a certain occasion that it was idle to think of increasing the Navy to any considerable degree. He suggested that no sooner would we build a certain type of ship designed for defensive purposes than the advance in knowledge of naval architecture and warfare would render the latest type of battleship obsolete and useless. He called attention, by inference if not by expressed words, to the submarine, intimating that it would eventually change the character of naval warfare. So, he said, these nervous and excited souls were becoming agitated without cause, and suggested that we ought not to spend any large sums of money for the purpose of advancing military and naval preparation.

We on this side of the Chamber were in the minority; we could not legislate. The majority could. The chief of the majority favored delay. So delay ensued. We had, it is true, some votes on this side that might have presented and supported a bill, but they would have accomplished nothing beyond a few vociferous exercises and the mere printing of the bill. In public matters with the majority party always rest both the power and the responsibility. The majority has that responsibility; they have had it since the 4th day of March, 1913; they have it now in both branches of Congress; they have it in the executive departments. Every great governmental department, every bureau—in fact, every agency charged with legislation, with administration, with the exercise of discretionary power in this country—is in the hands of the Democratic Party.

So that if there was any delay, Mr. President, in the military and naval preparation it was because the chief of that party and the responsible leaders of that party thought it unnecessary to hasten preparation or to go much beyond the ordinary appropriations which had been devoted to that purpose for a good many years. So nothing was done.

It would be as fair, there would be as much reason, Mr. President, in charging from 25 to 50 per cent of the cost of military and naval preparation to the Democratic Party as to charge the Republicans with the increased cost of the merchant shipping to be built under the bill lately passed by the Senate.

If it is a good argument in one place, it is equally good in the other place; and the responsibility, as well as the result, in the latter case an increase in the cost of military and naval preparation which, because of the delay, has exceeded by many million dollars the increased cost involved in the purchase of merchant shipping must be charged to the Democratic Party.

It is estimated that the revenue bill will raise some $205,000,000 of additional revenue. I wish to submit a few observations on the fiscal policy and financial record of the majority party. Their methods of taxation are basically different from those of the minority party. The appropriations have aggregated a considerable sum, and all the increase in appropriations over previous years can not be properly charged to military and naval preparation. There is a very large increase in connection with other matters, in other items not connected with the public defense. There are some millions of dollars unnecessarily appropriated, I believe, on a great many things that are not even indirectly connected with national preparedness. But the increases to which I refer are none of them a part of the plan of public defense.

I wish to speak in detail, Mr. President, of certain objectionable features of the revenue bill. I have specifically a criticism to make on page 30 of the bill, and I shall mention the particular objections before I shall submit any criticisms of a general character.

On page 30, section 10, in part 2, referring to taxation of corporations, I find this provision:

SEC. 10. That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid annually upon the total net income received in the preceding calendar year, from all sources, by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company organized in the United States, no matter how created or organized, but not including partnerships, a tax of 2 per cent upon such income; and a like tax shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid annually upon the total net income received in the preceding calendar year from all sources within the United States by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company organized, authorized, or existing under the laws of any foreign country—

So that it includes both domestic and foreign corporations. I continue to quote from the bill—including interest on bonds, notes, or other interest-bearing obligations of residents, corporate or otherwise, and including the income derived from dividends on capital stock or from net earnings of resident corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, or insurance companies whose net income is taxable under this title: "The term 'dividends' as used in this section shall include any distribution of the profits or earnings of a corporation or association, whether made in cash or stock dividends."

This section as written will result in a manifest injustice. The senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] has offered an amendment, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed on August 21, 1916. This amendment is designed to, and will, if adopted, correct the manifest injustice referred to.

The injustice would work a particular hardship upon the fire insurance companies of the United States. A fire insurance company that has back of its policies resources which can be made instantly available to meet its contingent liabilities is known as an "old line" company or a "stock" company; in fact, various terms are applied to it, amounting to the same thing, but they describe a particular class of fire insurance companies as distinguished from mutual companies, which have no capital stock, no investments to lie back of the companies, and nothing on which to rely, except the collection from the various certificate holders or members of an assessment upon the happening of a loss making them liable under the terms of the contract which the companies issue to their members.

Section 10 broadly applies to the old line fire insurance companies having a capital stock and shares which represent an investment, and investments to safeguard the policies which they have issued are particularly affected by this provision.

What is the purpose of a fire insurance policy? It is to make reimbursement upon the happening of the contingent event, whether it be fire or the hazards of the sea, whether it be some convulsion of the elements or the happening of some contingent event that is dependent upon man alone. The risks that are covered by a great variety of stock companies aggregate, over 12 months, many hundred millions of dollars. They do not represent a matured liability. It is contingent. That contingent liability is a part of the business and credit resources of this country.

The value of a fire insurance policy as the basis of credit is not properly considered, I think, by some Members of the Senate. The business of this country, the credit extended to many lines of mercantile and manufacturing enterprise, is based almost directly in some instances upon the contract that the policyholder takes out covering certain lines of hazard. The more the cost of doing a fire insurance business is burdened, the higher the premium rises, and the greater the consequent cost upon the property owner who seeks to protect his line of credit by an insurance contract. The value of a fire insurance policy consists in obtaining the money when the contingency happens; not that you shall have it a year from now, Mr. President, not that it shall be paid at the pleasure of the company assuming the obligation. Its value depends upon practically the immediate payment of the sum contracted to be paid by the company.

In the great fires that have scourged our country the uniform experience of the business world has demonstrated the truth of this. In the great Chicago fire of 1871 it was shown. In the fire at Boston it was shown. And without enumerating other great calamities that have afflicted the country, a few years ago an earthquake on the Pacific coast laid in ruins the principal city of the Pacific slope. The value of a fire insurance policy to a property holder in San Francisco was dependent upon the promptness with which the company met the loss. He needed the money to rebuild, to continue his business, to meet his maturing obligations, and without prompt payment a large part of the value of fire insurance protection would have vanished.

Mr. President, $240,000,000 of fire insurance obligations matured within 36 hours of the time the first tremor disturbed the people of San Francisco. Two hundred and forty million dollars were paid, paid without litigation, paid promptly. The remittances came in from the domestic companies of the United States and from all the foreign countries that were admitted to do business in the several States of the Union. The $240,000,000 helped rebuild San Francisco. They helped the business men of San Francisco continue on their course.

Fifteen million dollars of liabilities matured a week or 10 days ago when the explosion came on the island in the port of New York. There was enough of an explosion at Black Tom Island to have caused the entire prosperity the Democratic Party talks about. It deals in comparatively little things. There was enough property destroyed in the twinkling of the eye to cause enough prosperity to build the argument on we have heard here for weeks. A single explosion can cause prosperity in the Democratic Party, just as when there was a drought in Kansas or Illinois, or when the chinch bugs or grasshoppers used to eat up the crops, the Democrats always read the news and said: "Well, now, that looks good for us, don't it? We will beat them next time."

What became of the $15,000,000 of liabilities in the explosion? It was covered by fire insurance contracts. Where did they get the money? Did they borrow it at the banks? No. Some of it was borrowed, but not all. From what source was it derived? They took stocks, securities that were current on the market, and converted them into cash.

There is not a single responsible fire insurance company in this country, none admitted from the various countries of Europe to do business in the States, that does not carry as a part of its resources a very large amount of securities currently negotiable on the market. Comparatively few of them are bonds, but a very large quantity of them are negotiable securities in the form of shares of stock that can be readily assigned to anybody that wants to buy them. So a part of the necessary resources of the fire insurance company that intends to cash in on its contract when called upon is found in these securities. They are the kind known to the banking business as liquid assets, readily convertible into cash to meet the liabilities upon their policies in case of the happening of these great public calamities.

What is the natural result? Under this provision they are taxed—> including interest on bonds, notes, or other interest-bearing obligations of residents, corporate or otherwise, and including the income derived from dividends on capital stock or from net earnings of resident corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, or insurance companies.

The amendment offered by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] provides:

> That the income embraced in a return of an insurance company organized in the United States shall be credited with the amount received by such company as dividends upon the stock or from the net earnings of resident corporations, joint-stock companies, or associations whose net income is taxable under this title.

This amendment covers the remedy. These dividends, drawn from these securities held as liquid assets, have at their source by the issuing corporation already paid one income tax. Then, when the dividends are included in the income of the holding company the fire insurance company that keeps the securities for the purposes I have indicated they are charged to it, under the bill as written, as a part of its income, and the holding company is again compelled to pay an income tax on them.

It might be said that ordinarily there is some offense in one corporation holding stock in another corporation; but in this particular instance there is no question raised as to the holding corporation controlling the issuing corporation. They hold these securities or shares in a great variety of companies—industrial, transportation, banking, or whatever it may be. Whatever on the market offers in safe investment and dividends of the amount they have to purchase they invest in and hold, not for the purpose of unifying corporate control, but for the purpose of obtaining an asset readily converted into money. So if they are charged as the bill is written it becomes double taxation—a tax upon the source and a tax upon the receiver again.

This injustice applies to life insurance companies as well, it seems to me.

I doubt very much whether it was the intention of the framers of the original act that this should be done when it is figured out how it will apply. Why should fire insurance companies be so taxed? To them war has brought losses, not gains. Whatever munitions manufacturers have made, they have had nothing but loss. Fire has taken its toll.

There is another burden. I am going to adhere to my illustration about insurance companies. On page 99 of the bill, section 56, it is provided:

> Corporations, joint-stock companies, and associations shall pay 50 cents for each $1,000 of capital, surplus, and undivided profits used in any of the activities or functions of their business, including such sums as may be invested in or loaned upon stocks, bonds, mortgages, real estate, or other securities.

I doubt very much whether the full force of that provision is appreciated. The investments of both the fire and life insurance companies are covered in section 56. This section, for instance, would have the following effect upon the fire insurance companies:

There are held many millions of dollars as investments. The double taxation criticized a moment ago upon the dividends paid, unless the amendment offered by the Senator from New York should be adopted, is one burden. The one in section 56, on page 99 of the bill, is another burden of 50 cents per thousand on capital, surplus, and undivided profits used in the business, including such sums as may be invested in bonds, mortgages, and the like. This will put an additional burden upon these companies.

The third burden I find on page 115 of the bill, in the following words:

> Each policy of insurance or other instrument, by whatever name the same shall be called, by which insurance shall be made or renewed upon property of any description (including rents or profits), whether against peril by sea or on inland waters, or by fire or lightning, or other peril, made by any person, association, or corporation, upon the amount of premium charged, one-half of 1 cent on each dollar or fractional part thereof.

Exempting companies that are purely mutual in character.

This is a third burden, Mr. President. I have computed, from the premiums paid on fire insurance alone in the United States, what this additional burden will mean to the fire insurance business of this country. In 1915 there were paid by property owners in the United States $349,647,280 in premiums. One-half of 1 per cent of the premium will mean $1,748,236 alone added to the cost of carrying fire insurance by the property owners of the country.

Neither fire nor life insurance companies can stand indefinite burdens heaped upon them. Either class of companies—and I apply my reasoning now to both of them—when the burdens reach a certain point must pass the burden on to the person or property insured or the companies eventually must go into bankruptcy. These excessive burdens laid upon the insurance interests of the country will have one or the other effect inevitably. Senators must not look alone to the large resources of such companies. Large resources are balanced by nearly as large liabilities, leaving only a prudent margin of safety.

There is yet another burden carried by the fire insurance company. The rates of fire insurance are regulated by the statutes of the several States. In addition to that, in every State where the regulation occurs they are charged a license fee upon the business done, and, in addition to that, charges are made for licensing their agents that represent them in the State.

This license fee is not a mere license fee; it is a revenue measure. Under the guise of inspecting and examining and licensing them to do business and protecting the policyholders, the State makes it a source of revenue; and the larger States and some of the smaller ones, in proportion to their revenues received from the taxation of property, show that they receive many millions of dollars annually from this source alone. About $15,000,000 are collected every 12 months from the life insurance companies of the United States alone under the guise of license fees. In fact, they are mere revenue measures, taxing the companies for the privilege of doing business in the States.

Here, then, are at least four burdens laid upon the fire insurance companies of the country. One is a 2 per cent tax under this bill—doubling the present rate—upon the net income. Another is a tax of 50 cents per thousand proposed upon the capital, surplus, and undivided profits of the company, including such sums as may be invested in the various securities I have named. Another is one-half of 1 per cent on $349,000,000 and over of premiums collected annually. The fourth is the rates that are fixed by the States and the charges for inspection and license fees in the several States of the Union.

It seems to me, in view of the necessary character of insurance, that it should be the last thing in the world to be singled out and burdened with additional taxes. In addition to all those proposed burdens, all the companies pay the usual property taxes of all other citizens.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. On yesterday I suggested that this seemed to be not only double taxation but treble taxation; and now, from the statement made by the Senator, it seems that it is quadruple taxation.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is quadruple taxation; yes, sir. The more the Senator from New Hampshire and others investigate this matter the more unjust the burden will appear to be upon not only a legitimate enterprise but a necessary enterprise for the people of New Hampshire and Illinois. Our business men can not survive without adequate property insurance. It is as legitimate and necessary an occupation as I know of in the country.

Before I leave this subject I wish to make some comments which will apply to all forms of insurance—life insurance, fire insurance, casualty insurance, surety bonds, compensation bonds, bonds covering the action of the elements, either the wind or marine risks, or whatever the form of hazard that is to be written, whether it be as extended in the covering of the risk as written by the Lloyds or confined simply to the issuing of a policy against the hazards of fire.

There are in the United States 28,000,000 policyholders of life insurance alone, including the ordinary policy and the industrial policy, the individual policy, and the group policy that is written. I have a paper protesting, in behalf of the numerous companies in the United States, representing the 28,000,000 policyholders, against the radical departure proposed in this bill in the levying of additional taxes upon this necessary form of contract:

> How can the imposition in peaceful America of such taxation as is proposed by no war-ridden country in the world be defended?—

It asks.

I might amplify this statement by saying that with all of these powers there is no proposal to levy a burden upon the life or fire insurance companies of the foreign countries named hereinafter. It continues:

> Recently in South Africa, upon the suggestion of proposing a tax on life insurance, the members of Parliament were immediately polled, and over two-thirds at once telegraphed their opposition to this measure, notwithstanding the great need of this part of the British Empire.
> The Canadian minister of finance has stated that life insurance will be the last thing that Canada would attempt to tax.
> England since 1857 has exempted a sixth part of every person's income from income tax. If a person has an income of $6,000 a year, $1,000 of it is exempted totally if used for life insurance. It may be devoted to life-insurance purposes, to carrying any kind of policy he pleases, paid out in the premium, but that much of it is exempted as a premium on his thrift in providing for the unseen contingencies of the future. So the amount paid for life insurance is a deduction, just like a property tax in that country, and has been for many years.
> Germany is contributing heavily, by governmental aid, to compulsory life insurance.

In the face of the great military and financial burden she is carrying, her fiscal policy has never been so extended as to tax the life-insurance interests of that empire.

Peaceful America is the only place I know of, in the history of legislation of the civilized powers, where it is proposed to put this burden upon the life-insurance and fire-insurance interests of the country. We are at peace, and yet we are penalizing these great beneficial companies that protect our lives and write risks upon our property to protect us from bankruptcy in case of disaster.

What possible defense can there be for such a fiscal policy?

There is yet another provision, Mr. President, in part 2, affecting corporations. There is an exemption made of a certain part of the capital stock of the company carrying a risk. Ninety-nine thousand dollars of the capital stock is exempted. All above that is taxed. There is only one basis upon which to put the $99,000 exemption in the insurance business. It is that the insurance policies issued are guaranteed by the $99,000 of capital. That is the fund that lies behind the policy to secure its payment in the event of loss.

I think this provision of the bill was written without specific knowledge of the requirements of various States of the Union as to the amount of capital stock. The State of New York, as I remember, provides that a minimum capitalization of $300,000 is necessary for the organizing of a fire insurance company. The State of Illinois provides a minimum capital stock varying with the conditions that present themselves. I think 10 or 11, as I recall now from memory, of the largest States of the Union have a minimum capitalization for a fire insurance company. They have the same thing for a life insurance company, for that matter, too.

The capital stock of a company in the first instance is the resource behind the policy that is written. It is a liability. It is like the premiums collected, some of which are set aside as a reserve to add to the securities as the liability increases with the writing of policies. It is like the premiums collected on life insurance policies. What becomes of them? Are they the resources of the company, belonging to the corporate entity that we call the company? Not in the least. The premiums collected, together with the capital stock, if there be any—if it be not wholly mutual in form—constitute a fund set aside for the security of the policyholder, to make good the contract upon the happening of the contingency.

It is proposed to take the income in premiums each year and tax it, by the bill as it is reported here.

I do not see the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the chairman of the Finance Committee, present, but I have no doubt he could tell me—he need not be sent for; he probably is busy upon something else; I only wish to make the inquiry now, and he can answer it at any time before the matter is disposed of—whether the provision on page 36 of the bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Finance has been changed, or whether any change is contemplated.

As the bill came from the House, in lines 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 the House provided:

> And in the case of insurance companies the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds and the sums other than dividends paid within the year on policy and annuity contracts—

May be deducted.

I think this is a necessary deduction. Conceive for a moment of the infinite injustice of permitting this provision to stand stricken out. I prefer to think it was an oversight and was inadvertently omitted.

As the bill came from the House it only reenacted the provision found in section 2 of the act of 1913. Section 2 is the income section of the Underwood tariff act.

What are these net additions to the reserve each year? An elementary knowledge of life insurance is all that is necessary, I think, to show the fairness of such an exemption. The person receiving a life insurance policy at a certain age belongs to his class. For each $1,000 of life insurance written at his age the mortality tables say that it is necessary to charge a given premium. He pays that given premium at the stipulated age at which he enters. The premium is based upon the expectancy. The mortality table is the product of years of experience. Without it and its guiding hand no life insurance company could successfully maintain itself in the country.

One hundred thousand persons are taken at a given age or at birth. It is noted each year how many die, and the records are kept of the hundred thousand human beings until the last relic of mortality has gone to his grave. The expectancy at a given age is estimated from the number of years that each lives, beginning at this certain age, whatever it may be. The premium with a man 25 years of age necessarily is less than one at 50. The premium at 25 is fixed upon the idea that as he grows older, based upon his expectation in the mortality table, the cost of carrying his risk would necessarily increase. He pays more at 25 than the risk really costs, but the life insurance company equalizes the contract, and when he reaches the age of 50 or beyond he pays less than his risk is worth. Paying more at one time and at the other less, it equalizes itself so that the amount paid per thousand is a fair paying rate for the risk at the age at which he receives the policy issued by the company.

This premium that he pays each year in every well-conducted insurance company in this country is no more of a resource or an asset individual to the company than the deposits in a savings bank or commercial bank is a part of the individual or corporate property of the bank or banker.

For every thousand dollars of life insurance there is set aside a reserve to cover the maturity of the contract, whether it be an endowment, life policy, annuity, or in whatever form it may be written. So when the premium is paid annually the reserve laws of, say, the State of New York apply to it. Some of the largest insurance companies in the world have their home offices in New York City. Many others, though doing business all over the country, have their offices in certain others of the Eastern States. These companies are all of them doing business on the level-up premium plan, but the largest companies in the world now are mutual companies. Some of them started as stock companies years ago, but the very philosophy of life insurance companies precludes the idea of its being a profit-making enterprise except to the policyholder, because if one idea has developed it is that the mutualizing of the companies is the natural tendency of the business. Consequently some of the original stock companies now have a mutual department, so that you can write one kind of policy or another according to your wishes.

The policyholder each year pays a premium. The laws of New York, the laws of Massachusetts, the laws of Pennsylvania, the laws of Ohio, the laws of Illinois, the laws of every State that I ever had any occasion to investigate, require, if I pay, for instance, $35 premium on a thousand at my age, a certain proportion of that to be set aside as a reserve. What for? For the guarantee of the performance of the promise to pay my policy when the event happens.

What becomes of the other, some one says? Does that become an asset of the company, increasing the profits of the stockholders? It can not, if it is a mutual; it is an impossibility. The net reserve that is set aside for each thousand dollars of insurance represents a liability and a resource to meet that liability. It is equally so with a stock company. The net reserve laws require it to be done by them.

What becomes of this net addition to the reserve required by the laws of New York State? Does it lie idle? Is it deposited in some favored bank and nothing done with it? Certainly not. It becomes a resource for investment purposes. It goes into your State, Mr. President [Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair], in the cities and in the agricultural districts, it goes into my State, and into many of the Southern States.

I have a list of the investments of one of the principal companies in New York City; a company of more than $800,000,000 of resources and of almost an equal amount of liabilities, excepting only their surplus. That is set aside as a prudent dictate of the business men who conduct this great enterprise. The people of Alabama, Louisiana, Illinois, Colorado, all pay premiums. In every State in the Union, all over Canada, in Europe, you find premiums collected. I go down into the State of Alabama, and I find more money loaned in Alabama by this company than is taken out in premiums. I find more money loaned in my own State than is paid out by the policyholders to the company in premiums annually.

These premiums then are set aside as a net addition to the reserve annually under the laws of the State where the life insurance company is created and are invested in interest-bearing securities, bonds, mortgages, investments that are approved by the insurance department of the State and of the several other States where these companies do business.

The interest is collected. It is added to the principal. I am speaking now of the premium. I am speaking of it as a principal sum for the guarantee of the policyholder.

Now, what is the cost of insurance? It is the original cost based on the mortality table, carrying a thousand dollars, let us say. Then in addition to that there is a cost which I suppose a manufacturer would call overhead charges, the managerial labor that is rendered at the different offices, the president, and other executive officers who have a general knowledge and supervision of the business, the actuarial department, the investment department, the department of the local agent who solicits and receives new business. Commissions are paid to the soliciting agent. This is a part of the cost of management. This belongs to the charge that is loaded on the premium in addition to the cost of carrying, based upon the experience of mortality tables.

Now, what else? The reserve set aside for each thousand is invested and bears some rate of interest. In a mutual policy we pay so much annually based on the mortality table and the cost of doing business. At the end of the year, if the interest rates are high, better than common, the income will be high, more will be collected and credited to your thousand dollars insurance earned out of your net reserve for the addition of the whole amount of the reserve for the year. That and all preceding payments are cumulative. If the cost is lower than calculated and interest rates better, a refund to the policyholder is made. They form a pool set aside and invested to run a race with the liability on your policy.

What is the natural result? The better the interest rates are and the lower costs and taxes the lower your charge will be. If the rates of interest go down your premium goes up. This is true of either a mutual or stock company.

What else is there charged in outside of the cost or risk and doing the business? The taxation, the $15,000,000 of tax charged the life insurance company, to illustrate by different States of the United States, under the guise of license fees, but in reality a revenue rate that is charged to the cost of carrying life insurance. Every additional tax, everything in this revenue bill, will be loaded on the premium carried down the line and charged to the policyholder when he takes out a policy of insurance, or if it is a mutual company it will increase the cost of carrying each thousand dollars of the risk.

That is what it means as written in this bill. It means loading a charge upon the policyholder and making the burden that much more.

So I am opposed to it. I do not think it ought to be allowed. I think it is a bad place to collect money, the last place in the world. I want to collect money not from all people who are prudent and thrifty enough and think enough of their families and those dependent upon them to provide for the contingency that comes some time to all of us.

I have already adverted to the fact that Great Britain since 1857 has exempted the sixth of a man's income to encourage and to buy life insurance.

That was done when Queen Victoria was on the throne of England, at the beginning or when she was a young woman in her reign, and in all the mutations of earthly affairs that have swept over the United Kingdom, in all the great parliamentary struggles ending in the difficulty consequent upon the dispute between the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England on the taxation of ground values, the questions raised by Lloyd-George, and all of those controversies of an acute character, this great citadel of life insurance has never been attacked in the United Kingdom. Gladstone, John Bright, Cobden in his palmiest days, never offered to tax life insurance. In the days when England was waging desperate war for her life, when Napoleon sought the domination of Europe, even then in those days England rose and said it would be a crime to impose a burden upon life insurance. In all that time no one ever for a moment said that this was a proper source to raise money, even in the supreme struggle for the preservation of the nation's life. Not from the days of Waterloo to the days of the Battle of the Marne, Mr. President, has England undertaken to lay a burden upon life insurance.

I am at a loss to understand why this is proposed. I depart from the political aspect of it and address myself to the economic side of the question. I can not think that it has been well considered. I can not think it is deliberate. I can not think that this burden would be added to a contract that is so beneficent in character and so philanthropic in its ultimate purpose.

I hold no stock in any life insurance company, fire insurance company, or in any bank. I should like to know why a bank ought to be taxed on its circulation, which I think is just, why it ought to be taxed on its income, like the rest of us, which still I think is just, and why then ought it to be taxed 50 cents on its capital stock, surplus, undivided profits, and the money invested in any form of bond or mortgage that it uses in its activities.

Why single out the banks? It is said that they have large resources. Have they? Have they liabilities? All the banks that I know anything about are the ones I investigated after they went into the hands of a receiver, and I found that with the very large resources of a bank went a correspondingly large liability. It is not their money; first, it is the stockholders' money, and after that the greater part of it is the depositors' money. It is the same way with these companies I am talking about.

Now, why burden them unduly? It is said we shall have to have revenue. Where will we get revenue? From whom? You say that we on the minority side of the Chamber are in favor of preparedness, adequate sums for the military establishment, for the upbuilding of the Navy, for fortifications, military posts inland, and so on, and you ask where will we get the money for it? You say that we are great in preparation until you come to devise methods of taxation.

I will tell you where I would get the money in a moment. I want as preliminary to state that out of the $777,000,000 that was collected the last fiscal year, ending the 30th of June, 1916, $211,000,000 came from customs duties and $514,000,000 of it came from direct taxes. The direct taxes are divided in about $304,000,000 from ordinary internal revenue receipts, $84,000,000 from the emergency tax of October 22, 1914, and about $124,000,000 from the corporation and individual income tax paid throughout this country.

If I were levying taxes, Mr. President, and had power to write a bill I have a pretty well-defined notion of how I would write it. I am not merely criticizing the majority side of this Chamber, but I am constructively criticizing it. I would substitute the method of taxation that I favor.

They say you are in favor of a high protective tariff. I am not. I am in favor of a reasonably protective tariff.

I am in favor of a protective tariff that is adequate to give the advantage to our producers and our markets and to raise a large part of our revenues from customs duties and not from direct taxes.

They say a large part, how much? As much as we have levied in the times when we were in authority in Congress and in the Executive authority. How much is that? We have uniformly raised from 45 to 50 per cent of our total ordinary revenue from customs duties. In 1910 under the Republican act, which ceased to exist October 3, 1913, we raised nearly $333,000,000 from customs duties alone.

In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, under the tariff act of October 3, 1913, we raised $211,000,000 from customhouse taxation, as our Democratic brethren call it, and as we say we raised it from customs duties, that impose a larger part of the burden upon the importer, the man abroad who sells in our market. We charge him a license fee for getting in here. How much is that?

There was $122,000,000 less of customs duties raised in 1916 than were raised in 1910.

In 1915, the fiscal year ending that year, it was a little worse than it was this year. We raised then from customs duties $209,000,000, in round figures, under the Democratic administration since the 3d day of October, 1913.

Mr. President, instead of collecting from 45 to 50 per cent and a fraction of our total revenues from customs duties, we have collected from 27 to 30 per cent of our total revenues from customs duties under the Underwood law since October 3, 1913.

There is where the difference comes in. We can not forever appropriate without some time taxing. When we tax, we have got to tax either the one way or the other. It must be either a direct or an indirect tax.

I reprobate the fiscal policies of the party now in power, because they inevitably drive toward the system of direct taxation.

We favor on this side of the Chamber the placing of the burden upon the shoulders of those who live outside of our country. If they are to share in our benefits, we tax them at the customhouse and make them pay it.

The criticism is—I have heard it here in this Chamber so many times—that whatever is charged by way of a duty on a like domestic article is added to the price of the article in our domestic market, and that the proprietor, the manufacturer, the dealer, whoever he may be, gets the enhanced price and puts it in his pocket, and that it is a consumption tax.

The answer to that is the price of beef before the war began. When the great packing houses of Chicago built their slaughterhouses in Argentina, constructed their refrigerator boats to come to New Orleans and other of our port cities, under the free list of meat products, it was confidently predicted—and I heard it on the majority side of the Chamber—that the price of meat would be thereby diminished.

It had the same effect it has always had from the earliest times that this process has been tried. The beef coming up from a boat clearing out of Buenos Aires selling its products in our market did not reduce the price; but in our country they raised the price of beef to the prices found on our markets and sold it at that enhanced price after the product was free listed. That was before the European war broke out.

In imports and exports connected with this same subject there is some very interesting matter. I shall not read it at length. I shall content myself with some general observations, quoting such part as I need to illustrate from memory, embodying the details later into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD if I am permitted when I ask that permission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask permission now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask permission now that at the close of my address I may be permitted to place in the RECORD extracts from various documents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the request will be granted. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. So instead of reading at any length from those documents I shall merely recite some facts which are apparent.

For instance, in 1906 our free imports were $549,000,000; our dutiable imports were $676,000,000. Our total imports were $1,226,000,000. There were free of those imports 44.81 per cent. There was dutiable 55.19 per cent. Our dutiable and ordinary receipts that year were $554,000,000; duties collected $300,000,000; and to divide it on a 50 per cent basis of customhouse collections and from all other sources, including internal revenue, 50 per cent. It runs in the ratio of from 45 to 50 per cent down to 1913. On the 3d day of October of that year the Republican protective tariff act ceased to exist. In its place came the Democratic act of October 3, 1913.

In 1914 the 30th of June ended the greater part of that fiscal year. It was not entirely a year under the Democratic tariff. Certain rates had been postponed. Certain results evidently were had from the schedules that remained in force for a time from the old tariff act. The free imports of 1914 were $1,127,000,000. The dutiable imports were $766,000,000. The total imports were $1,893,000,000. There were free 59.44 per cent and 40.56 per cent were dutiable. Seven hundred and thirty-four million dollars was collected as the dutiable revenue receipts of the Government; $292,000,000 were the receipts from customs duties. Thirty-nine per cent of our total revenues of the country passing into the Public Treasury were customhouse receipts, and 61 per cent were receipts from other sources, all of them direct taxes with the single exception of a portion of the miscellaneous receipts and a couple of battleships were sold for $12,000,000. That was before the price of shipping had gone up.

In 1915, without reading the figures, I wish only to quote that there were 61 per cent of the imports dutiable, 61 and a fraction as against 38 and a fraction, 61 per cent free as against 38 per cent dutiable, and the total proportion of customs revenues for that year was 39 per cent of our total revenues and 61 per cent from direct taxation.

In 1915 it ran 30 to 70. In 1916 it ran 27 to 73. Out of the total of $777,000,000 of public revenues collected for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, 27 per cent of it was derived from customs duties and 73 per cent from direct taxation. That is charged to the war. That is a misapprehension. Our customs duties decreased.

Let me quote some other figures: Our total foreign trade is composed of our imports and exports combined. In 1906 under Republican tariff schedules for every article of merchandise that came in of our total foreign trade our exports were 58 per cent and our imports were 42 per cent.

It ran in something like the same ratio down to 1913. In the last year mentioned—1913—57 per cent of our total foreign trade was exports and 43 per cent imports. Beginning with 1914, 55 per cent, under the Democratic act of October 3, 1913, which was claimed to be a revenue tariff, our exports were 55 per cent and our imports were 45 per cent of our total foreign trade. In 1916, 66 per cent of our total foreign trade consisted of exports and 34 per cent of imports.

It will be observed that, with the tremendous exports of the fiscal year 1916, our per cent of exports of our total foreign trade was only 66, which is only 8 per cent higher than the per cent of exports in 1906.

In conducting a business, Mr. President, I do not care to look at the sum total in dollars and cents when I go to figure the profit and loss side of the ledger; what I want to ascertain is what per cent net I have gained at the end of the year. If I am running a cotton mill I will do the same thing; if I have an iron foundry or am making brake shoes in South Chicago, I ask the same thing—how much have I made at the end of my business year; what per cent have I earned on the amount of money invested? It does not make any difference how small it is, if it is earning a profit and is still on the safe side; equally it does not make any difference how small the percentage is, if it is on the other side of the ledger I have lost something for the year. It is, after all, the percentages that are significant, Mr. President; it is the percentage that counts; it is the percentage that indicates the direction in which we are traveling.

So in 1906—a Republican protective-tariff peace year, with all the world-peace merchandise—our percentage of exports was 58 per cent of our total foreign trade and our imports were 42 per cent; while in 1916, with Europe at war, with the nations of the Old World in deadly conflict, with armed legions covering all Europe, with the pursuits of peace largely lost to the industrial world, at that time, Mr. President, when they drew upon us for vast sums, when they borrowed our money, when they bought our merchandise and sent us their gold, when they exchanged their credit for our products—in that year, Mr. President, our exports equaled only 66 per cent of our foreign trade—8 per cent more than in a peace year!

How much were our exports then? Four billion three hundred and thirty-three million dollars, and only 8 per cent more than in the peace year of 1906. I repeat, Mr. President, it is the per cent that counts; it is the per cent which indicates the direction in which we are traveling.

Without referring to any tabulations which I have made, let me add in 1916 some invidious comparisons with 1913. We have segregated the peace merchandise from the war merchandise; the peace years from the war years. The peace merchandise is the kind that the ordinary person, not drawing lines too tight by way of distinction, would understand comprises those articles that do not enter directly into military or naval operations. I do not include even footgear as a part of the munitions of war, although every great St. Louis boot and shoe house has an unprecedented balance in its foreign trade caused by this form of export.

The war merchandise is the kind that enters, without further change of form, except the mere putting it together, if it be shipped in the knocked-down form, directly into military or naval operations. In that division, therefore, between peace merchandise and war merchandise is a most significant explanation of this difference of 8 per cent.

I take all of the peace merchandise of 1913—the last year of a Republican protective tariff, when there was no thought of war—and I figure all of the peace merchandise in that year in one column. I turn to the identical articles in the war year of 1916 and figure them in another column. If I place the peace merchandise of 1916 in the ledger alongside of the peace merchandise of 1913—1916 being a war year and 1913 a peace year—the comparison is very significant.

In 1916 the industrial energies of the great powers of Europe were engaged in battle; they were not developing their export trade. The merchant shipping of England had in a large part been withdrawn from peaceful transportation and had been devoted to warlike naval purposes. The mines and the mills of England were turning out shells and guncotton. The employees who had been on the great pay rolls of England were carrying muskets in the field.

In spite of those conditions our exports of peace merchandise in 1913 were $100,000,000 more than the like identical articles of peace merchandise in 1916. In other words, in the war year of 1916 the exports of peace merchandise were a hundred million dollars less than the exports of the same articles in 1913.

Our exports of peace merchandise have diminished, even in a war year, with $2,197,000,000 of export trade, ending in June, 1916—with that tremendous volume, the greatest in the history of the Republic—our exports of peace merchandise in the war year of 1916, under a Democratic tariff, are $100,000,000 less, in round figures, than the exports of similar articles in 1913.

Let me draw the deadly parallel, Mr. President, with another double column. I take the war merchandise of 1913—a peace year—and compare it with the war merchandise of 1916—a war year. In that war merchandise I do not include either horses or the "Government mule," but still $73,000,000 worth of horses went out last year from our country and about $23,000,000 worth of mules. I exclude those in order to be accurate and to be fair. The war-merchandise exports for the year ending June 30, 1916, aggregated $1,500,000,000 more than the exports of the war merchandise of 1913; and still it is said that all of this prosperity is caused by a Democratic tariff.

Our Democratic friends say, "Look at our export trade; look at our direct taxes; look at the Federal reserve act; look at the Federal Trade Commission; look at the rural-credits bill; look at our legislation." That is given by them as the cause of the alleged prosperity which they claim is sweeping over the country.

Why, the rural-credits law is a joke in most places—an idle jest. We do not need that half so much as we need something else. I know what the farmers of this country need. I think I can speak with as much authority for the farmers as can anybody else in this Chamber.

What we need in this country, in every place, North and South as well, is more farmers.

What we need now is not so much 3 per cent money as a farmer who is willing to go out on the land and work 14 hours a day, who is willing to work with his hands in sunshine and in storm; a boy who is willing to stay on the farm, do that kind of work, and get the rewards and the sturdy, manly independence that inevitably follow from a well-managed agricultural occupation.

There is not a farmer in all the great Northwestern country that I know of who is not meeting the problem daily, Mr. President, of getting farm help. Our educational system is to blame; public sentiment is to blame; the false sense of pride that some of us have is to blame.

I would not give a rap, Mr. President, for an education in a university that sends the boy home with the degrees consequent upon a five years' course; I would not pay his passage money across the ocean to old Oxford, if it brings him back home with degrees and still he is ashamed of his father, with his old overalls and the work-hardened palms of his hands. If it only gives him degrees that start him on the highway to being a human loafer, and looking upon men who work with their hands as following a menial occupation it were better he never left home. Our universities and our colleges have done too much of that in the last 30 years.

I have more respect for the man who will work with his hands and not be ashamed of it than I have for the graduate of Harvard, Yale, or Oxford who will blush every time he is asked how his father makes a living, and he says he is a farmer, or that he works on a farm or in a foundry or that he is a carpenter or a shoemaker or a blacksmith.

What we need in this country, Mr. President, is not rural credits; we need more men who will work. There is more laziness in this country than there is want. More men looking for a job than are looking for work.

I never have seen the time in my life since I left home at 13 years of age that I have been out of a job, and I have been through a good part of three Democratic administrations, and that is saying considerable.

If I could not get my kind of a job, I took the kind I could get; and as soon as I could do better I did so, as everybody ought to do, I believe. However, as I have said, I never have seen the time yet that I was out of work.

Instead of pluming ourselves on our superior wisdom as statesmen who are going to solve the question of "back to the farm" with a rural-credits bill, with cheap money which will not cheapen elbow grease 5 cents on the dollar, we should do something to get men who will farm. If you do not, and if you give them money, when you get through all you will have will be a bad Government debt.

A good old Puritan, whose ancestors came from New England, once asked me why I was against the literacy test in the immigration bill. I said, "Because we are educating too many American-born boys whose ancestors run back to the Mayflower not to work."

Down South, where you have a good many darkies, some of you got an idea they ought to do the manual labor. I do not think there is anybody in the Senate that I know of shares that idea. I have a very great respect and a positive liking for many of you fellow Senators who come from down in that country, for you are pretty stalwart Americans, but every once in a while there is somebody with a mistaken notion there that anybody who goes out and digs in the ground or pushes a jack plane or swings an ax or pulls a crosscut saw is working just like a negro.

Why, the strength and the greatness of Germany are due to the fact that her people will work at anything that is legitimate. Why is it that little Belgium once blossomed like a garden? For the same reason. Colonies of Belgians came to my section of the country long ago, before the war broke out, and I know of their thrift and industry. Why has Holland with her dikes wrested from the sea her fertile gardens? Because she will work; she has done it with the labor of her own hands. The best artificers in the world come from the low countries; the best polishers and cutters of precious stones come from Antwerp and Amsterdam; and all of them work. England's glory and the greatness of her race is in the colonists who work, whom she has sent around the world, from Plymouth Rock to Australia.

Why, the rural-credits bill has had no more to do with the prosperity of this country than a canceled postage stamp in diminishing the resources of the postal revenue.

A rural-credits bill! I hope some of you who need it will get cheap money, and that you will persuade others to go out in the fields and work. But if you are going to get 3 per cent money in order to hire somebody to do something you ought to do yourself, I will vote to repeal it the first chance I get.

I do not want cheap money from a land bank to be a sort of vicarious atonement for a man who will not work himself.

That is what is the matter with this country. You always want to get something for nothing. Release credits! Yes; we are going to have free credit. It is always something free.

I heard Tim Murphy, the old-time actor, on one occasion. He did not have a very good crowd when he started, but he got out on the stage and went on with a sort of monologue. Finally he rose upon his toes, and he said, "What I have to offer now is the great attraction of my show. Everybody come, because it is absolutely free." And they came running in from the outside, like a house on fire.

So whenever the Democratic Party wants to stay in or wants to get in it always has something free. You are going to have money borrowed by the farmers free or at 2 per cent or 3 per cent or, like Coxey's bonds of 25 or 30 years ago, noninterest-bearing bonds.

Who would want them? I do not know. I would not want them for any funds that I might be custodian of. No life insurance company would want them, for they have to secure some income from their investments.

But, nevertheless, our Democratic friends want something free. As far back as I can remember, Mr. President, they cried "free trade"; just 20 years ago this summer we were in the throes of "free silver"; and now it is "free credit." Nobody but the Infinite knows what will be free next.

Can anybody have free credit? Credit is like character; it is made by your life, your industry, your thrift, your conduct, your standing with your fellow men; and all the legislation that can proceed from this Chamber, and all the Federal reserve banks and rural-credit systems that may be created may come and go, and all the other devices that seek to relieve us of the burden of the curse or the blessing that Adam put on us in the garden may come and go, but we shall still be under the painful necessity of observing and obeying the economic laws that lie at the foundation of thrift and gain. There will be nothing free. Our credit will be what we make it.

I have no objection to an eight-hour day. I have voted for it several times in smaller jurisdictions than we are acting for now. So far as I myself am concerned, I do not want for my work any eight-hour day. Under certain exacting conditions and surroundings of service, I am willing to give it to others who follow occupations that I never have followed, but I do not want any limitations on my hours of effort, and I do not want any free credit. I do not want any free silver.

I am just as much opposed to free credit as I am to free trade—and that is almost what the bill is which was called by Speaker CLARK up in Maine last week "the best tariff bill the country ever saw." What has it produced? A deficit.

What kind of a tariff is it? If the platform were to be taken as a guide, it would be a tariff for revenue only; but unhappily the reports of the Committee on Finance of the Senate and of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House call it a "competitive tariff."

Well, what is a "competitive tariff," anyhow? That is a new thing which has appeared on the horizon, a new constellation which arose in 1913 in the economic heavens. A competitive tariff is a mongrel. It is a mixture, born of a tariff for revenue only and free trade; and, like a mule, it has all the unholy instincts of both ancestors and the virtues of neither.

"Free trade" and "tariff for revenue only" always produced industrial chaos in the days of your ancestors, as your "competitive tariff" produced industrial ruin before the present war broke out.

Some of our friends on the other side of the Chamber were telling us a while ago—and while the dogs are barking over there, to use the classic language of my friend the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], we might just as well bark a little ourselves and get some facts in the RECORD—how prosperity came right after the tariff bill was passed, in October, 1913.

I saw some of it in Chicago. In the winter of 1914 I went down on Michigan Boulevard one morning, Mr. President, to see some of my constituents. I got up about daylight, and I went down to the church of Johnston Myers, the Emmanuel Baptist Church, a great stone church. I reached there about sunup. In the basement of that church they had arranged a very large space in the rear as a kitchen, a place where breakfast could be prepared. I went down by invitation. I did not know whether anything of that kind was occurring. I had been down in Washington all winter. So I went home to see how my constituents were getting along. I observed the men who came in and went out. They were given their breakfast. We counted them. We counted 1,700 men that morning who ate breakfast at the Emmanuel Baptist Church on Michigan Boulevard, in the city of Chicago.

I saw one man with a leather coat on, which indicated that he was a freight handler. I tapped him on the shoulder, and I said, "How does it happen that you need a breakfast." He said, "I am out of work." I said, "Where do you work?" He replied, "In the Illinois Central yards; I am a freight handler." I asked him what was the matter. He said, "I have nothing to do." "What is the reason?" I inquired. He answered, "The trains are taken off; the freight trains have been killed; shopmen are laid off; there is no construction work; we only repair what we have to repair; there is not anything doing in my line; the crews of my train were laid off on the 1st day of September, 1913."

That was a few months after the sun had risen in the heavens of prosperity.

As I have said, there were 1,700 men in that church. For safe measure, we might assume that one-third of them were tramps, but that would leave something like 1,100 or 1,200 men who had as good-looking faces as any of my constituents and who were absolutely out of employment and thrown upon charity.

This was in the beginning of the winter of 1913–14. What happened? It grew worse all winter. Once after that, in February following, I happened to be in the city of Chicago, and I went over to what is called by the man on the street the "Down and Outers' Hotel," on the West Side. That is what the boys who are out of a job call it, too. It is really a 5 and 10-cent hotel, built and run at cost by Charles G. Dawes. At that hotel, if a man is out of work, he is able to get a clean bed, a bath, and a meal for from 10 to 12 cents. He is given, in a ward in an open room, a clean bed, with clean sheets, with enough of them almost for every comer, for 5 cents. Not only that, but a bath is required, and that is one of the godliest things I know about any institution. A man is required to take a bath before he is allowed to go to bed.

A Democrat said to me that he objected to that because it tended to make Republicans out of the men. I said to him, "You are mistaken; my Democratic neighbor is as clean as I am." I guess we will let that pass for a jest. I only referred to it to place it in your memory, where you will not forget it.

To continue, I went over to that hotel, where for 10 cents a man can get a bed that is closed in, with the same regulations in regard to a bath. He would still have to take a bath. When you advance in wealth and become the possesser of affluence you still are not allowed to indulge in uncleanly habits. You can get a doughnut for 1 cent; you can get a cup of coffee for 2 cents; you can get a piece of pie for 3 cents, and, if you only had a dime, by the time you spent the dime you would be ready to hunt a job the next day under a Democratic administration.

I went over there in February, 1914, Mr. President, toward the evening. They do not open the doors right away; they open them at a given hour; and in February, 1913, there was a string waiting like a procession to buy tickets here in Washington when the circus comes to town, and they were running both ways, north and south—a string of men standing in line waiting for their turn to go in and get a meal and a bath. That institution, until warm weather came, was compelled to turn away men who wanted lodging not because they wanted cheap accommodations but because they had only a few cents left in their possession. This hotel is a monument built by Charles G. Dawes to the memory of a noble son who died a few years ago. It is a perpetual memorial to the kindly heart and sympathetic soul of its founder. Now, that continued—and I am reciting the record of my own personal experience on those things—until about 1915—the fall of 1914 or the winter of 1915—and it is the history of every large city in this country during that time.

Then a change came. I am going to read from Democratic testimony, Mr. President. In the hearings had on this bill are the statements of some men that I think material on this question. I read from page 228 of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Finance Committee of the Senate. This is the testimony of Mr. Lamont, president of the American Steel Foundries, of Chicago and New York. This was the hearing on taxing munitions of war:

When these original munition makers were filled up—and that was very soon after the opening of the war—there were still large numbers of contracts that were available. There was very little business in our own particular line—what we did was mostly for the railroads. The business was slack.

This was at the opening of the war. The business was slack, he says.

We had two or three of our establishments shut down. We had a great many men idle.

Now, this is where the curtain rises when nobody seems to be thinking about it. You know, if you ever examined men in the witness chair, that it is a good plan to talk to them about something else for a long time, to get their thoughts directed to something else, and then, especially if they do not want to reveal the whole truth, to ask them about it when they are not thinking. I am disposed to think that the matter was not in issue here. I do not mean this of the witnesses, but of those who conducted the hearings. They were talking about something else, and the witnesses answered when the Senators were not thinking of its bearing, maybe, or not thinking about what we are thinking of just now, at least.

He said:

We had a great many men idle. Ordinarily we employed about seven or eight thousand. We accordingly decided to take some ammunition contracts. I have here a copy of a contract which we made with His Britannic Majesty's Government, through J. P. Morgan & Co., agents, for 400,000 eight-inch howitzer high-explosion shells, involving about $18,000,000. Of said total contract price about one-half thereof, namely, $9,000,000, goes for machining the entire 400,000 of shells. We were not equipped to do any of this machining. At about the same time we made this contract with Messrs. Morgan & Co. we made a contract with the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. to do the machining, as we were not in position to do the machining.

Then he goes on to explain how it was sublet and that he did not make as much out of it as otherwise would appear, which, then becomes material on the subject of the hearing. But here is some testimony of this gentleman that business was slack and that the war then gave them contracts.

On page 229 Mr. Lamont continues:

The provision taxing gross receipts and not net profits and the provision exempting subcontractors were so startling, so revolutionary, so hard upon our company, that we at once asked for the courtesy of this hearing, determined to present these thoughts to your committee.

Then, on page 239 of the same pamphlet, is the testimony of Mr. Stedman, vice president of Curtis & Co., of St. Louis, Mo.:

If we had to pay that tax, it would be so heavy that we could hardly afford to pay it and compete with them, and we would have to shut down our shops and probably sell our equipment to them. The proposed tax is so heavy that I think it would simply result in the cessation of that kind of business here.

Senator THOMAS. How many men would be deprived of employment on that account in this country, approximately?

Mr. STEDMAN. Some of these other gentlemen are more familiar with that than I am.

Senator THOMAS. I want only a rough guess. I do not expect you to be very accurate.

Mr. STEDMAN. I should say 25,000 or 50,000.

Mr. KINNEAR More than that. The Westinghouse Co. has 23,000 working in their shops.

The CHAIRMAN. Not all of those are engaged in the manufacture of munitions, however?

Mr. STEDMAN. Not all of them, but a large percentage of them.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Probably 100,000 in all. I employ 3,500, and I am arranging to employ 1,500 more.

Senator THOMAS. Where is your place of business?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Erie, Pa., sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What per cent of the 3,500 men would be engaged in the manufacture of these munitions?

Mr. GALLAGHER. At my plant, all of them; they would make nothing else.

Again, on page 251, I desire very much to have with the other in the RECORD the statement of Mr. Scott, president of the American Steel Foundries, Chicago, Ill.:

I should like to say one word, and that is that practically every line of business in the United States has benefited directly or indirectly through the war in Europe and in the number of exports that have been sent over there for war supplies, which has made money in this country plentiful, and which has increased the sale of ladies' shirt waists and men's garters and chewing tobacco and everything else consumed in this country. They have all benefited directly or indirectly through the prosperity that partly comes from the large exportation of materials, food products, and supplies that we are furnishing to the warring nations in Europe. Now, as they all have benefited, would not the most equitable way to distribute the tax be to put it on incomes and corporations, and then everybody would stand their share?

Then, again, on page 267, there is some more corroborative evidence of Mr. Andrew C. Gray, attorney at law, representing the Chamber of Commerce of Wilmington, Del., speaking of the Du Pont Co.:

They took the contract at the beginning at a dollar a pound for military powder for foreign Governments and the representatives of foreign Governments. On the faith of these contracts, and the price they were getting—and allow me to say one thing to show you that the price was not excessive or extortionate; the military powder which they sold for a dollar a pound they had been selling prior to the war for 90 cents a pound with 10 per cent off, which would be 81 cents net. They fixed the price of $1 a pound and increased it only 19 cents a pound, in view of the vast expenditure they would have to make for plant and other purposes and getting the organization together. They spent in the construction of new plants out of their gross receipts—and those expenditures have extended almost up to the present day, well up to 1916—I know of my own knowledge, from information brought me, some $60,000,000 in plant development. That was out of the gross receipts, and realizing when they spent it that at the conclusion of this war 90 per cent or more of that expenditure would be a total loss. In the manufacture of this powder in 18 months they have paid in wages to laborers, without counting overhead, upward of $45,000,000, in the equipment of their plant, in obtaining new machinery, etc. They paid war prices. They did not stop at dispute over the price. This terrific amount of powder which they sold abroad, and for which the money was sent to this country, was not kept by the Du Pont Co., but has been distributed all through this country in all ramifications of trade, and at the same time the people of whom they bought machinery or anything else that was necessary in their business did not keep their prices down.

As you gentlemen know, the price of nearly every commodity in every line of trade has been rapidly increasing in the last 18 months. The raw material which goes into the manufacture of powder has increased—not doubled or trebled—but increased from twenty times up to as much as one hundred times as much as it was two years ago. They have had to take that into consideration in the making of these contracts. They estimated that their plant would cost about 10 cents a pound—that is, new construction, but they found out that it cost over 14. Fourteen and 8 per cent gross receipts which this bill proposes to put on would be 22, so that the net result would be less than what they were receiving before the war, and that in the face of the fact that everything that goes into the composition and manufacture of powder has been very largely increased. In addition to that, I think at the beginning of the war they employed a total of five or six thousand men. They have rapidly run that up until to-day in Delaware, New Jersey, and Virginia—in those three States alone—they employ upwards of 50,000 men—I think nearer 60,000 than 50,000

MR. DU PONT. Say 50,000.

Mr. GRAY. About 50,000 to-day. Ever since the beginning of the war they have been paying every man whom they employed higher wages—and I am speaking now of actual laborers in the plant and not the office force or anything of that kind, which, of course, is very huge, to look after its business—they have paid the laborers in that plant higher wages than were ever paid munition workers before. In addition to paying them these higher wages in order to get a better organization and preserve their working force intact, they have been giving monthly bonuses of 20 per cent on top of those wages. So that they have distributed in wages in 14 months $25,000,000 and bonuses of 20 per cent to their employees besides.

On page 269, I wish to insert something that is not strictly material here, and I am going to read it so as to have it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the rest of my observations. I have heard a good deal of talk—somewhat loosely and inconsiderately, I think—of the lack of patriotism of large concerns; that the man who controls millions, or who himself is worth millions, ceases to be a patriot; that his millions own him; that he does not own his millions. I have heard that the man of wealth has no regard for the public defense. I have heard that criticism a great many times.

Here is Mr. Gray's testimony on that subject. I anticipate that he would not put such evidence in a hearing of the Finance Committee of the Senate unless it were true. I wish, in justice to those men who are reputed to handle millions and to be millionaires themselves, to read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what they did when the War Department went to them to buy some of the munitions of war that our own country needs.

I do not know how—if this tax is imposed on military powder, which comprises such a great percentage of the Du Pont Co.'s business—they can pay this tax without raising the price on their blasting powder and dynamite. This company has been engaged in a huge business and has been selling its product abroad. It has been buying its raw material at a greatly increased price in this country. It has been dividing up the money it has received from abroad. It has not raised its price upon commercial powder—that is, blasting powder and dynamite. The American people are getting powder, among the very few things they are getting, at no higher price to-day than they were getting it before the war began. The United States Government is getting powder from the Du Pont Co. at the same price they got it before the war began. Gen. Crozier went to one of the vice presidents of the Du Pont Co. and said he wanted from 780,000 to 800,000 pounds of powder. That was last winter. The vice president said, "Of course we will look after our own country first. We have contracts up to capacity, but we will work you in." Gen. Crozier said, "Well, my hands are tied. I am limited to 53 cents a pound." The vice president said, "Very well; the United States Government shall have it at 53 cents a pound." Gen. Crozier said, "But you can sell all your powder at $1 a pound." The vice president said, "I know it; but we will look after the United States Government as we have always done."

Somewhat later, a representative of either the Army or Navy came to the Du Pont Co. and said that they could not get any toluol in the market—that is the explosive charge in a shell—and that it was $1 a pound, but they could not get it even at that price. The Du Pont Co. said, "We will set aside what you need, if you will tell us how much you need." They told them, and they said, "Very well, we will set that much aside for you." The representative said, "But we can not pay $1 a pound. Our appropriation is not large enough." They said, "We will let you have it at just what it costs us, 40 cents."

Now, that is the way the Du Pont Co. has treated the Government always. That company has been patriotic, and, as I said before, we Delawareans claim to be patriotic. They made the Government a present of about $350,000 worth of powder and over $300,000 on that toluol.

This is not strictly in point, but I digress in order to bring it in with the rest of the testimony.

Resuming, now, on the main question in controversy:

Allow me to call your attention to something that I know the Du Pont Co. is trying to do. They had not made a contract, they had not signed a contract with any foreign nation since the 1st of January. They have 60,000 workmen in their plants whom they are trying to keep at work, and to whom they are paying high wages on a short day's work, and to whom they are paying a bonus of 20 per cent. They are spending their pay in New Jersey, in Virginia, and in Delaware, and in order to keep them at work and keep their organization going, they have been reducing their offers of powder to foreign nations from $1 to 90 cents, to 85 cents, and to 80 cents, and they are now offering it at 65 cents, and have not received a suggestion of interest on the part of any foreign power. In the meantime the price of all the materials has gone up to a great extent. Another thing Gen. Crozier stated, and which was quoted recently, was that at the Government powder plant without any overhead charge at all the mere factory cost was before the war 38 cents a pound for the large-grain powder; that owing to the increase in price of raw materials, without the overhead, the plant cost of the manufacturer of that large-grain powder had increased from 38 cents to 53 cents, the exact price at which the Du Pont Co. sold it to the Government—and that is in the Government plant without any overhead charge.

Now, the Du Pont people have had to meet the increased cost of raw material. They can go no lower. In other words, to secure business, if this tax is put on, they will have to withdraw that offer which they have made in the endeavor to get business and keep this huge assembly of workmen together and at work at good wages.

Again, on pages 273 and 274, which will conclude all that I desire to submit out of this pamphlet, Mr. Gray continues:

The CHAIRMAN. What material do they buy for the manufacture of military powder?

Mr. GRAY. I really do not know very much about it. Mr. Irenee du Pont knows. I think he could tell you exactly what goes into the composition. There is cotton. They have bought upward of 1,200,000 bales of short-fiber cotton. It was 2 cents a pound when the war began and now is 8 cents a pound.

Senator THOMAS. They use a great deal of alcohol, do they not?

Mr. GRAY. They use a great deal of alcohol, sir. That is one way in which the Du Pont Co. helped this company in the distribution of its product. Do you want to know the other things that go into the manufacture?

The CHAIRMAN. There has been urged here by the manufacturers of arms shells, shrapnel, and things of that kind, that instead of levying the whole tax on the gross earnings against the original primary contractor, the one with the foreign Government, the tax should be distributed among all who participated in the manufacture of the——

Mr. GRAY. The raw material?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; down to the raw material.

Mr. GRAY. Take sulphur—and, for instance, while the price of powder has been decreasing, sulphur has gone up from $18 a ton to $150 a ton. Cotton, which was 2 cents a pound for the short fiber, we are buying it now at 8 cents a pound.

Senator THOMAS. There has been a great advance, too, in the price of nitrates?

Mr. GRAY. Oh, yes, sir; there has been a terrific rise in everything that goes into the Du Pont Co.'s products.

The CHAIRMAN. What am getting at is, can a tax levied on powder, whether it be on the gross or the net receipts, be passed down, in part, to those who furnish the material or parts of material out of which the powder is made?

Mr. DU PONT. The principal ingredients which go into smokeless powder, which is a large part of munitions, are sulphuric acid and alcohol. Besides that, there is nitrate of soda, which is all imported from Chile, and I do not think we could follow that back. But the three large and important ones, cotton, alcohol, and sulphuric acid—part of our sulphuric acid we make ourselves from the sulphur, which becomes a further raw material that could be followed back. It comes from Louisiana and Texas.

These are the distributions of the profits on war munitions, which reach every avenue of life. The farmer to-day out in the corn belt will get his share of war-munition profits. The cotton-plantation man will get his share of it. The short-fiber cotton is used in the manufacture of high explosives at Chicago, at Gary, and at Indiana Harbor.

At a single plant in Gary, Ind., there go out every 24 hours, with three shifts of men working eight hours a shift, 48,000 pounds of guncotton. That company uses up its proportional share of the linters or the short-fiber cotton which is a necessary ingredient in the manufacture of this explosive.

It goes into the corn belt, because alcohol is used in the manufacture of powder. The great distilling companies of Peoria and Pekin, Ill., where more than 40,000 bushels of corn are used every 24 hours, have been running on full time. They do not ship all that alcohol down into Kentucky and bring it back again and call it "Sunnybrook Rye." There is a vast quantity of that output that goes into the manufacture of war munitions, and that has kept the distilleries running. So that their alcohol has gone to Delaware, it has gone down to Hopewell, Va., it has gone into Chicago, it has gone into every place where explosives are made.

It is just like the enterprise down in Louisiana, where the greatest supply of sulphur in our country is found. Some man had enough enterprise to risk investing some money in it some time ago. He put all he had in it, as the story runs, at a venture. Suddenly war conditions developed, and sulphur went from $18 a ton—the then commercial price on the general market of this country—to $150, as Mr. Gray says; and, of course, this man is making some money. Probably he will be taxed under the component-parts paragraph of the munitions war tax. I will get to that later on.

I read these extracts from these hearings, Mr. President, principally to emphasize the fact that I submitted a while ago. I showed then that the increase of exports of distinctly war material in 1916 was $1,500,000,000 greater than it was on the like articles in 1913.

Then I know what has become of the 1,700 men that got their breakfast down on Michigan Boulevard in the winter of 1913–14. I know what became of the men that applied to Mr. Dawes's hotel for lodging in 1914. Where are there idle men to-day? Nowhere. Where is their pay roll? They are included among the fifty or sixty thousand men with the Du Pont Co., the men at Gary, at Indiana Harbor, in Chicago, in Peoria, in New York, in Wilmington, Del.—every place where these plants and all other industries alive with the direct or indirect result of war orders are that produce the articles that go directly into the manufacture of war supplies.

Then, as to the indirect results, I do not suppose any of us ought to call cotton a war supply or a munition of war, any more than we ought to call corn a war supply, although indirectly both of them enter into the manufacture of war materials. Not more than five weeks ago, Germany amended its articles of contraband and included cotton among contraband of war, just because we were manufacturing high-grade explosives in this country, one of the essential elements of which was cotton, and were getting them across to the allies, who control the ocean carrying trade to a very large degree; so much so that Germany must depend upon herself for supplies of a warlike nature for the central powers.

I think, when all of these things are taken together, it establishes what the lawyers would call the case. I think it proves it. It shows that these changes that have occurred since 1913–14 are because of these pay rolls that have absorbed these lines of men who were without work and who were asking for charity for breakfast.

There is another feature about the munitions contracts on which I wish to remark. Originally this bill was written so as to tax the gross receipts. That would have been a manifest injustice. The gross receipts are entirely different from the net receipts, because between the two must be taken out all the charges, and what is left would be the net profit. But as amended the bill taxes the net receipts, without any reference, too, to the time the contract is made. It imposes a 10 per cent charge on the net profits.

To me it savors yet of injustice. A contract has been made. We know what the income tax is; we know what wages are; we can make a reasonable estimate upon what our raw materials will cost that we must buy from others to complete our article in its finished state; we know the amount invested in the physical property; we know the amount necessary for depreciation or the amortization of the plant, if it is one of these that is destined in the nature of things to be temporary in its character. All of that a business man can figure on; but how can he figure on the unanticipated burdens that may be laid upon him by some act of this kind?

I think it is fair to exempt from the tax on the net profits of munition manufacturers contracts that are existing at the time this law becomes operative. I have prepared an amendment of that kind, which in due time I shall offer and ask to have lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to ask the Senator whether it would interrupt him to dispose of the conference report on the amendments to the Federal reserve act at this time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection, if I can resume the floor.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I desire to discuss that measure when it comes up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to lose the floor.

Mr. OWEN. I do not wish to have the Senator lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I shall conclude what I have to say before the hour of adjournment arrives, and I shall be glad then, of course, to have the conference report taken up. I may quit a little sooner than I otherwise would, if it is necessary.

There is the additional feature of the inheritance tax. I am not opposed to an inheritance tax. I think 42 out of the 48 States of the Union levy an inheritance tax. I have a list of them, showing that, outside of the two Territories—Porto Rico and Hawaii—the 42 States collected in the year 1914–15, $24,381,547 of inheritance tax, or death rates, or succession duties, as they are known by various names in the several States of the Union.

The State of New York, for instance, is listed in 1914–15 as deriving from its inheritance taxes a revenue of $8,263,893; the State of Pennsylvania, $2,516,790; my own State, $2,092,960. Our inheritance tax is nearly 20 years old. It is a fixed source of revenue.

A letter from the State treasurer of Illinois, dated July 14, 1916, in reply to a telegram reports to me that the inheritance taxes averaged nearly $2,000,000 a year for the last five or six years. The larger the estate, of course, the more the tax that goes into the public treasury. The provisions of our law exempt estates of less than $500, and prescribe a low rate for smaller estates. When they go above a certain figure, so as to be large enough to go beyond want, the rate is increased. It is a graduated inheritance tax. It has been litigated, so there is no question about the validity of an inheritance tax graduated. It passed through the State supreme court, and was also decided by the Federal Supreme Court some years ago, and all features of it were discussed, making the graduated inheritance figure a large tax upon the larger estates and diminishing in proportion as the estate grew smaller, and exempting certain smaller estates altogether.

I am opposed, Mr. President, to the levy of an inheritance tax by Federal authority unless that inheritance tax is divided with the State. In Great Britain the last fiscal year of 1915, the latest I have been able to get, they collected about $140,000,000 or $142,000,000 in our currency on the inheritance tax. Great Britain has about $85,000,000,000 of total wealth. We have in this country of total wealth about $187,000,000,000, not far from twice the total estimated wealth of Great Britain.

There is no good reason why we should not collect without unduly burdening the estates or their beneficiaries at least $100,000,000 divided. Fifty per cent ought to go to the several States and the other 50 per cent ought to go into the Federal Treasury. I do not think a double tax ought to be levied upon inheritance. The State ought not to collect what they are collecting at present under their own statutes and this measure, the burden of which is unknown, be added to the estate at the same time.

The natural result will be, if the burden is laid on by the Federal Government, the general assemblies of the several States will either greatly reduce or will entirely repeal the statutes authorizing the levying and collection of an inheritance tax.

If these estates be segregated into classes, the revenue so realized varies from $8,000,000 in New York to $4,415,000 in New Jersey. Three States other than New York collected over $2,000,000—Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Illinois. Two States collect $1,000,000—California and New Jersey. Ten States collect between $200,000 and $500,000 annually—Colorado, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Missouri, Tennessee, Utah, and West Virginia.

Four States collect over $500,000 annually—Connecticut, Minnesota, Michigan, and Wisconsin. A great part of the revenues of a State where it rises up to a half million a year or to eight million a year, as in the State of New York, is collected from the inheritance tax.

If that be taken away by imposing burdens by the Federal Government under this revenue bill, then a Senator will be faced by his constituents with the question, "Why did you take this burden that we are now levying upon the inheritance tax and transfer it to the Federal Treasury, thereby increasing it on our own, making it necessary that the general assembly of the State shall repeal it? Why did you take that source of revenue away from us? What justice is there in it? Does not the State fix the statute of wills and the laws of inheritance and does not the State furnish the probate force, the clerical department, the constabulary that serves process, all the sheriffs or marshals' forces, whatever name may be given to that branch of officers in the judicial machinery of a State?

Does not the State furnish and sustain the instrumentalities, create the rules for the devolution of the property from the dead to the living? Why, then, should not this State, as it stands at the gateway for the devolution of this property, receive the revenue or at least a portion of it?

I believe the Senators who vote without protest against this feature of the revenue bill will be asked, and justly asked, by their constituents why they permitted it to be done.

I believe in the lawful rights of the State. An inheritance tax is nothing more than an excise tax. It is taxing the privilege that society exacts for the passage of property from the ancestors to the heirs. That is an artificial right, it is true, and it is subject to excise rate. It is just like the privilege of being a corporation; it can be taxed for the privilege. It is just like munitions or any other article; it can be taxed because the Government has the power and needs the money.

The laws of the State furnish the method of transmission; they lay down the rules, paying the expense; every dollar of it is appropriated by the local taxpayers. It is true the office earns fees that go into the Treasury, but otherwise it would lighten the burden of the general property tax if it were not done.

Why should the States not have a half and equitable portion of the inheritance tax which is collected under the rules for the devolution of property that the State authority makes?

I do not have very much sympathy with this idea that because the laws of inheritance permit property to descend, being an artificial rule, you could take it away and destroy the laws of inheritance. That is true technically. Governmentally the power exists, but it would be void of justice to deny to the owner the right to pass to his kin or the object of his bounty, whoever he might be, the proceeds of either his industry or his inheritance.

Away along back in 1215, in the days of the great charter, when the farmers of England got together and took from King John some of his arbitrary power and made a written constitution limiting what he might do by the decrees of the Crown, there were some wise provisions in that document. If you turn back to that ancient charter you will find the laws of exemption there; you will find a recognition of the right to inherit property, not the fee in real estate, but the personalty. It is more than 700 years old, and still we are taxing it here by the Federal Government, and, according to the argument of some very learned gentlemen, as if it were a crime for a man to claim the right to pass his property under the laws of descent or to make a will.

There are some features of it that probably are sociological. I do not care to discuss that very much. I rather incline to making the larger estate bear a larger burden in a graduated-tax plan, partly because the larger estates require more protection in time of turmoil. In the event of civil war or in riot and great public disorders they must be protected and ought to pay a large share.

Sometimes there is an irresponsible ownership of wealth created by the laws of descent or by the statute of wills. I know to-day of persons who acquired property by the laws of descent or by a will operating great public utilities who themselves seem to have no adequate idea of what that utility means or their duties in handling it in its relation to the general public. It creates in me no hostility to the institution of property, only that society ought to take a larger share of taxation from such property than it otherwise would in order that it may create an impression that the burden is properly distributed, at least, and that it may help argue against the prejudice thereby aroused.

I come now, after leaving the inheritance tax, in the order of the bill and the income tax, which I will refer to after a while again, to the duty on dyes and dyestuffs and materials. This is the article that Brother Redfield referred to as being proper to encourage, as it was an incipient industry.

I remember years ago when I had the mumps the old family doctor came and felt my jaws and he said, "My boy, you have mumps in the incipient stage."

Whenever Brother Redfield, the Secretary of Commerce, sees any new industry that might be languishing or has not started yet he does not say that a protective tariff is the right thing, but he says it is all right to levy a rate of duty that will permit an "incipient" industry to be developed and sustain itself; an incipient industry, as if it were an economic disease. Whenever we begin to manufacture something in this country it is in its incipient stages. It is like smallpox and foot-and-mouth disease, protected while it is in its incipient stages, Mr. Redfield says. He uses an unfortunate phrase, does this great authority of the Democratic Party at the head of the Department of Commerce.

So dyestuffs are to be protected in the incipient stage. After it gets to be a well-developed disease, after the malady spreads all over the country and they may make enough dyes for everything from a beauty parlor clear down to a hosiery factory, then we are to repeal it and abate the disease, presumably.

Here are the provisions, two kinds of duty, and again they are most solicitous about terms. I notice in the bill it says on the material, which would be a raw material to a dyestuff manufacturer, 15 per cent is to be levied ad valorem and on the dyes in their finished state a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem, and then in addition to that a special tax of 2½ and 5 cents is to be levied.

Now, what is that special tax? What do we call it here on the protectionist side of the Chamber? We call it a specific duty.

They are so careful in terms they will not mention a specific duty any more than they will mention a protective duty. They call it an incipient thing and they call it a special tax. It is just like paying a tax to go out and sell whisky and to manufacture tobacco, a special tax of 2½ and 5 cents a pound.

How long does that continue? The thing will be in its incipient stages for a while after the war ends. Right now the war furnishes all the barrier needed. Consequently the time of the taking effect of this act is limited to the time peace is concluded among the belligerent nations in the Old World. Then for five years the special taxes are to be remitted, one-fifth each year after the act becomes operative, until in five years' time they will be gone, provided, however, that if it be ascertained after the act becomes operative that they are not manufacturing at any time before the five-year period runs out 60 per cent of the domestic consumption of dyes, the President may by proclamation suspend the whole of the Federal tax, of the special taxes of 2½ and 5 cents a pound, any time. It leaves, however, a 15 and 30 per cent ad valorem duty in force all the time.

I turn here on the subject of a permanent duty of 15 and 30 per cent ad valorem on dyes to the fact that sugar, wool, and chemicals were turned loose on the free list here in the summer of 1913. I remember the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in his effort to preserve some semblance of protection for the dyestuffs of this country. I remember well when he stood in his seat and warned those in charge of that legislation that sometime there would be a barrier necessary to make the manufacture of dyes in this country permanent, so that we might be independent of other countries. Inside of two years from that time, more or less, after the war broke out, the warning was verified by the actual market conditions of our own country.

Now, we go back and put a duty that is 15 and 30 per cent on it permanently. There is no provision, so far as automatically ending it or giving power to the President to end it; there is no provision for ending it at any time. So it seems to me it is purely a protective tariff, designed to become operative after the war shall have ended.

Here is what Brother Bryan says about a protective tariff. This is an extract from Bryan's Commoner of October, 1915:

REPUBLICANS WILL LAUGH US OUT OF CAMPAIGN.

What Democrat will be rash enough to propose an increase in import duties? The party has been trying for a generation to reduce the tariff, and has at last succeeded. It required an almost superhuman effort. Shall we now turn around and undo the work? The Republicans would laugh us out of the next campaign. They would say that preparedness was only a pretext—that the increase was a confession that tariff reform was a failure.

Alongside of the dyestuff industry is the restoration of the tariff on sugar. This came out in the Sixty-fourth Congress, and is now operative. I do not know what the motives of all who voted for it may have been; I know what my motive was. It was twofold: I believe primarily in the protection of sugar, either cane or beet; I believe that in sugar, as in dyestuffs, we have the opportunity, the soil, the climate, the money, and the labor to produce them in quantities enough for our own use here at home. For that reason I voted to restore, and favored at all times a restoration of, the duty on sugar.

Some of my Democratic brethren undoubtedly voted for the duty because they needed the revenue. There is collected from sugar a definite amount, almost unfailing in its resources, running from, say, fifty to as high, possibly, as sixty-two million dollars a year. This revenue was needed. The condition of the Treasury made it indispensable. So it was passed as a revenue measure, we will assume, by our Democratic neighbors across the aisle.

I notice in the platform on that subject, which was written at St. Louis in 1916, last June, that it contained no plank or denunciation of a tariff on account of its unconstitutionality, even if it be protective in character. For what possible purpose is the 15 to 30 per cent ad valorem duty provided in this "revenue-only" bill if it is not protective? Will it collect any revenue now? Not a penny. Will it collect anything until after the war has concluded? No. What is its purpose, then? Its purpose now is to put into tangible form some kind of a barrier behind which the dyestuff industry of this country may build itself up.

There has been a demonstration on a large scale in our country of our dependence upon other manufacturers for this article, which is so essential to certain of our fabric manufacturers in the conduct of their business. So, I take it, that it is not for revenue that the dyestuff schedule is put into the revenue bill, but that it is there for the purpose of safeguarding the future when peace shall be concluded, when the great military hosts shall return to industrial life, and when the importation of dyestuffs will be renewed manyfold over anything this country ever saw; that it is proposed now to take time by the forelock and to prepare, so that the manufacturers may develop the industry here in order that we may be independent and subsist in that particular upon our own resources. Let us prepare for another grim reminder from the Commoner.

Now, I come to discuss the antidumping clause. It is essentially different, as the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] pointed out this morning, from the antidumping clause that was proposed by the Republican minority in the summer of 1913. It is sufficient to say that while a deathbed repentance is not evidence of very great sincerity, it is better than no repentance at all. If an antidumping clause of any kind is of any value now, it was of equal value in 1913.

War conditions will cease; the stocks of merchandise are accumulating, not only of dyestuffs but of all the nearly 5,000 different articles that pass through the customhouses of the country. They will continue to accumulate until a treaty of peace is concluded. Then, unless there is a barrier built up, we know the vast flood of imports that will pour into the American market. I do not believe in building the barrier any higher than is necessary any more than I believe in building a levee along the Mississippi any higher than is necessary.

When it is high enough you do not need to waste money and time by building it any higher when it is adequate to the highest flood tide and to the crest of the waves that rush down with the great snows and the great rains when the freshets come; but I want it high enough. If it is an inch too low, or if it is only on a level with the flood, it is too low, and there might just as well be no barrier at all, because the whole of it will go.

I have heard at considerable length about the beauties of an income tax. I believe in the principle of an income tax: I have uniformly voted that way; I have so announced myself wherever it became proper to do so. An income tax levied in the way this tax is levied is unjust.

I have one objection to the wording of that portion of this bill relating to an income tax. The House bill is a better bill in at least one particular. The House bill provides an exemption of $3,000 for every person who is single. It also provides for an exemption of $4,000 for the head of a family. The present law, which is found in section 2 of the tariff act of 1913, provides for $4,000 exemption for a married person where the husband and wife live together. There is many a head of a family who is not a married person, who by misfortune and bereavement has a greater burden than the married man who is the head of a family. I know single men, many of my associates, who by death have been deprived of their helpmates, and yet they have a family of children.

I know others who not only have children who are dependent upon them for support, but who have aged relatives who are near of blood and who are a proper charge upon their industry. There is as much equity in the exemption provided by the House bill as any that could be written, making the exemption apply to the head of a family, and not measuring it arbitrarily by the mere fact of whether or not the person be married.

I know a good many married people who are without children, whose principal family consists of canines and servants, who have not as much merit in an exemption because they are married as have hundreds of men who are themselves single, widowers or women who are widows with families dependent on them. They are heads of families; they have a just right to call for an exemption, whereas a husband and wife who are childless are prone to spend their affections upon dogs of various degrees of social culture and pedigree, who "toil not, neither do they spin, and yet * * * Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these" dogs.

What natural justice is there in exempting such a couple and giving them $4,000 exemption, and as to somebody else, who has a houseful of children—girls growing up to be housewives and boys growing up to be soldiers in time of need, producers of wealth when they reach the age of earning power—still he is a widower, or their mother is a widow, there is no such exemption of $4,000 for them?

It is not very much, but it is all a little; it shows the drift of it. I think the House provision to exempt the head of a family has in it the elements of inherent justice.

Another thing. I never for my part was greatly impressed, as a permanent source of revenue, with the corporation tax. It came here at a time when the Republican Party was in power and thought it was pledged to revise the tariff downward. So it revised it in a way that produced less revenue than it ought legitimately to have produced. To make up what was lost in that way there was devised an excise tax levied upon corporations.

That is the second period to which the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House alluded in his report, where he referred to the excise tax on corporations which was introduced in the administration of President Taft. I think that was caused largely by a departure from sound protective principles. I look on it as a result of the Canadian reciprocity idea. Canadian reciprocity was advocated by President Taft and was voted for by some Republicans. I criticize neither. It was voted for by Democrats, and could not have been passed except by the help of Democratic votes. I do not criticize my Democratic friends for their action, but if I were disposed to criticize anyone, I would omit them and criticize my Republican associates, because a Democrat would be consistent in that particular at least, as he believes in a revenue tariff or in free trade, and reciprocity is a modified form of free trade, exchanging one benefit for another.

So the contemplated loss of revenue in framing the schedules of the tariff act of 1909 and the anticipated loss of revenue by the Canadian reciprocity act, in case Canada ratified it at the polls, led to the introduction of the excise tax. I think that is an unfair tax as a permanent source of revenue, and I will explain why, Mr. President.

I heard at least three Senators in the summer of 1913, when the tariff act was under discussion and while we were framing it, say that they proposed to take the taxes from the customhouse, to cease collecting customs duties and put the tax upon the wealth of the country. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in the House at that time, who is now an honored and useful Member of this body, declared that to be the purpose of that series of schedules. Last December, at the beginning of this session, or very near that time, he renewed the explanation in this body. He said that the tariff act of 1913 was designed to transfer taxes from the customhouses, to distribute them, and to impose them upon the wealth of the country.

I shall not argue at this time whether a tariff is a tax. That sounds almost like a voice from the wilderness resurrecting ancient issues, and I do not care to take it up at this time. What I do wish particularly to analyze is, whether the "tariff for revenue only," or a "competitive tariff," as it has been denominated in the controversy in this body, has transferred the burden of the duties collected at the customhouses, on whomsoever the burden might have been, and placed it on the wealth of the country. I want to show just how that has been accomplished.

Here are the three New England States of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont. Maine has an aggregate wealth of $1,069,000,000; New Hampshire, $649,000,000; and Vermont, $527,000,000. The three together pay an income tax of $1,064,000. Together they have an aggregate wealth of $2,200,000,000. North Dakota alone has a wealth of $2,141,000,000; South Dakota has $1,398,000,000. Together they have a wealth of $3,500,000,000. That is the estimated wealth of those two States alone. The income tax paid by the three New England States is $1,064,000, while the income tax paid by North and South Dakota is $234,000. The two States of North Dakota and South Dakota, having 50 per cent more wealth, pay one-quarter as much income tax as the States of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont.

Iowa has $8,000,000,000 of wealth, while Louisiana has $2,100,000,000 of wealth, a little over one-fourth as much as Iowa has. Louisiana pays $702,000 on account of the income tax, while Iowa, with nearly four times as much wealth, pays $790,000 income tax. One is a Southern State, so called, and the other a Northern State. It is as unfair applied to Louisiana compared with Iowa as it is applied to the three New England States I have named as compared with the two Northwestern States of North and South Dakota.

The two comparatively small States of Connecticut and Rhode Island together have a total estimated wealth of $3,250,000,000. They pay in the aggregate $3,825,000 income tax. Nebraska has an estimated wealth of $3,700,000,000, and pays $492,000 income tax—less than one-seventh as much income tax as Connecticut and Rhode Island pay, although she has a greater estimated wealth than that of the two New England States.

Let me take the State of Massachusetts, the total wealth of which is estimated at $7,000,000,000, and which pays an income tax of something over $6,250,000. Compare that with the figures as to the State of North Dakota, which has over $2,000,000,000 of property, one-third as much wealth as Massachusetts, but pays only $136,000 in income tax, which is less than one-seventieth of the amount paid by Massachusetts. Under the present system there is no distribution of the burden according to the wealth of the country, but there is a distribution according to the classification of the wealth, the occupation, and the way it is employed.

Now, let me explain in detail, Mr. President, what I mean by that: In the New England States it is well known that the inhabitants have availed themselves of every natural advantage. Some of their soil, especially along the coast, is not fertile; sometimes the winters are long in certain parts of that section of the country; they have no mines of precious metals; but they depend upon the industry, the thrift, the intelligence, the business ability, and the inventive genius of their people to develop their resources and to accumulate some of this world's goods. In every town and mountain valley of New England, in every brook, every river or branch of a river, it will be found that they have utilized to the fullest nature's resources. Even the surface of the water is not allowed to go to waste, but the watershed is found by surveys, a dam is built, the brook is caught, the surface water is utilized, a reservoir created, water power is developed, and the electric energy is used in manufacturing.

Now, whether they are making currycombs or clocks in Connecticut, whether they are manufacturing cotton goods in Rhode Island, whether they are quarrying marble and granite in New Hampshire and Vermont, most of these business enterprises are carried on by corporations. It is not to escape individual responsibility, because they pay their debts. It is because of the business advantage that necessarily goes with a corporate form of existence.

If an individual dies, his administrator or executor must wind up his business. If he is in a partnership, it has the same effect, because the death of a partner acts as a dissolution of the partnership and requires a settlement of its business. A corporation is endowed with perpetual life. Its shareholders may die, but the corporation exists.

The shares pass to the heirs at law and the business of the concern still goes on. If it is a going concern, all the shareholders may die, and it continues in its operation without interruption. So there is more than a mere escape of personal responsibility. There is the great economic fact that our industries can not be developed; our business can not be conducted; our manufactures can not be carried on; our banks can not be conducted; our great or small industrial enterprises in small country towns or the mighty metropolis can not be conducted, save through the agency of a corporation.

So, in New England, the manufacturing corporation is frequently found. In Louisiana, in the larger cities, it is frequently found. Some of what is classified as manufacturing machinery is on the cotton and sugar plantations. There the crude sugar requires a certain amount of machinery. The ginning of the cotton and the baling requires a certain amount of machinery. This particular kind of property is not classified under the head of farm machinery or implements. So, in the larger manufacturing States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and the New England States generally, the corporation is a manufacturing concern because that is the only way in which a continuous business can be carried on.

If 25 farmers put in $25 each and form a company with a capital of $100,000, they are taxed upon their net income. There are no exemptions for the corporation.

If the farmer keeps his $4,000 and lends it out at 5 per cent, the current rate on good securities in the part of the country where land is worth from $150 to $250 an acre, farm loans are available for from 5 to 10 years at 5 per cent, so he can keep his $4,000 and loan it out at 5 per cent in a kind of investment that he knows something about. He need not invest in a municipal bond or in United States Steel common and wait for it to come up to 96 and a fraction. He does not need to speculate on anything of that kind. He can loan on an asset that he knows about, because he plows it every day of his life, in the season. If he invested it at 5 per cent, he would get an income of $200 out of the $4,000. It would take a long time before he would reach the point where his investment, at 5 per cent, would make him liable to pay an income tax. If he is a single man, with an exemption of $3,000, he would have to have $60,000 and upward of that before he would pay a cent of income tax. He would have to have $80,000 if he is the head of a family or a married man before he paid a cent.

So the farmer, when he keeps his $4,000 in a loan or a bond, does not pay a dollar of income tax. I have no objections to that.

If 25 of them incorporate to carry on some business, with a capital of $100,000, and they make 5 per cent on the $100,000, they are taxed $50 on the $5,000 income. That taxes the 25 farmers just $2 apiece. It penalizes the farmer that much for changing the form of his investment. It puts a premium upon keeping it out, scattered in some way, so that manufacturing can not be conducted in his neighborhood by local capital. That is the necessary effect of it.

It has the same effect upon a corn producer or a cattle raiser in the Northwest or the Southwest that it has on the producer of cotton, sugar, or peanuts. That leads to the classification to which I alluded. Let me take the agricultural States first.

I will select the State of Iowa. I do not take my own State, because while there is a very large assessed value of real estate and a very large quantity of the wealth of that State in live stock, farm implements, and the like, there is likewise a large amount of our wealth in manufacturing machinery. Some of the great factories in Moline, Rock Island, Chicago, Peoria, and other points employ many hundreds of millions of dollars, all of it in corporate form; and so, being both an agricultural and a manufacturing State, it is hardly a fair State for the comparisons that I intend to make. I choose, rather, my neighboring State of Iowa, across the river, which is relatively more of an agricultural and less of a manufacturing State than Illinois.

The real estate and improvements of Iowa amount to $5,100,000,000. Their live stock amounts to $491,000,000. Their farm implements amount to $103,000,000. They pay $794,000 income tax. Connecticut and Rhode Island together pay $3,825,000 income tax, of which Rhode Island pays $1,103,000 and Connecticut pays two million seven hundred and some thousand dollars income tax. Now, note that Connecticut has $1,450,000,000 of real estate and improvements. It has only $22,000,000 of live stock and only $7,000,000 of farm machinery, as against the $102,000,000 farm machinery of Iowa and the $491,000,000 of live stock and the $5,100,000,000 of real estate and improvements. But Connecticut has $167,000,000 worth of manufacturing machinery. That is in those corporations I talked about a moment ago. In all the hills and valleys and in all her rivers that run down to the sea, in all New England, in all her corporate undertakings necessary for manufacturing purposes, the New England and other manufacturing States of the East and Northeast have a large proportion of their wealth in manufacturing machinery, which means shares of corporate stock when you trace it down to the individual owner.

So Connecticut has $167,000,000 of manufacturing machinery as against Iowa's $58,000,000 of manufacturing machinery; but the income tax paid by the single State of Iowa is less than the income tax paid by the State of Rhode Island by nearly $200,000, and is only in round numbers about one-fifth of the tax paid by the State of Connecticut. Rhode Island, for instance, has $600,000,000 of real estate and improvements; it has about $7,000,000 of live stock; about $1,883,000 of farm implements; it has $93,000,000 of manufacturing machinery, as against in South Dakota $6,000,000 in manufacturing machinery. South Dakota, on the other hand, has $38,000,000 of farm implements, $145,000,000 of live stock, and $639,000,000 of real estate and improvements. North Dakota has only $5,000,000 of manufacturing machinery, $49,000,000 of farm implements, and $125,000,000 of live stock, and $1,261,000,000 of real estate and improvements. North Dakota and South Dakota pays $234,000 income tax, while the two small States of Connecticut and Rhode Island in income tax, manufacturing machinery, pay together 16 times as much; and it is because their property is in corporate undertakings for manufacturing purposes, and is liable to income tax, while the farmer of North or South Dakota, having his land or his income or his manufacturing machinery in such a way that it is not collected in an aggregate form in corporate holdings, escapes the tax altogether.

Now, the income tax is fair enough. I think the corporation ought to pay it. I do not think the excise tax on a corporation which is manufacturing in character, and gives work to the pay roll that absorbs some of these idle men I talked about in 1913–14, ought to be permanently burdened in that way, because the manufacturer is an employer of labor.

Here are some compensations, however, that go along with it. The State of Massachusetts, with real estate and improvements of $4,100,000,000, and an area of 8,000 square miles, has an average value per square mile of $512,000. Here is the State of Florida, which has in real estate and improvements $429,484,000, with 54,861 square miles. That is an average value per square mile of $7,828. Rhode Island has $600,000,000 and over of real estate and improvements. It is 1,067 square miles in area, and every one of its square miles is worth $563,024—the highest valuation per square mile of any State in the Union, not excluding even the States of New York and Illinois, with the two largest cities in the Western Hemisphere. Still, little Rhode Island, because of the great aggregation of manufacturing machinery and the great development of her resources in a comparatipely small area, has accumulated the valuations named.

There is another aspect of it, Mr. President, which, I think, indicates that the taxation is unfair as I have described it. I am going to take Rhode Island again, with 114,000 wage earners, $55,000,000 of wages, and $280,000,000 of the value of their products, and put it alongside of Mississippi, for instance, with 50,000 wage earners, $18,000,000 wages, and with only $80,000,000 of the total value of her products. The States all run the same way. You penalize the States that develop their resources and furnish employment for the pay rolls of the country, that take up the idle men, that make it possible to make preparedness an assured fact. They carry the burdens of this revenue bill.

Mr. President, it is now 5 o'clock. I forbear to take more time. I believe that this bill ought to proceed to a roll call in due time, and other Senators wish to be heard.

I wish to conclude by recalling to the Senate the time when the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], in the summer of 1913, said that the most pathetic chapter in the history of Great Britain's political economy was the decay of her farming communities; that great areas of her land were turned into game preserves; that her sons had gone to the fertile fields of other countries around the world, and that her own plows had rusted in the furrow. That was true. The war broke out, and when the war broke out there came a change. Great Britain's leading men in Parliament and out of Parliament are now saying that England must begin to produce her own foodstuffs. She must develop her colonial resources, and the resources of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. She must not depend upon her merchant shipping to draw her foodstuffs from around the world. She must not only be industrially independent, but she must be, as to the production of her provision supply, independent of the rest of the world.

So the war is driving the people of Great Britain back to the land. The submarine has done more in two years to shatter the free-trade doctrines of Cobden and the university professors of Oxford and Cambridge than the arguments of free traders for 150 years. When the Deutschland came into the port of Baltimore it was an answer to all those who would make us dependent upon the rest of the world for our supplies. It was notice served upon us to develop our own resources, because our merchant shipping, if we draw supplies from around the world, can be cut off by a submarine from all the high seas where the tide ebbs and flows. So England has learned this lesson.

I now wish, in conclusion, to place in the RECORD, in the order I have used them, the tables to which I alluded at the beginning of my address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of South Carolina in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Free and dutiable imports into the United States for years 1906 to 1916, inclusive.

The Dingley protective tariff act was in force in 1906 and 1907.

The Payne-Aldrich protective tariff act was in force in 1910 and 1913.

The Democratic free-trade tariff act of 1913 was in force in 1914, 1915, and 1916.

Of our total foreign trade, the following shows the per cent of imports and the per cent of exports. The enormous exports of war supplies in 1915 and 1916 under a free-trade tariff keep the percentages of exports but a small per cent above the comparative exports of 1906, 1907, 1910, and 1913 under a Republican protective tariff.

Aggregate of United States exports and imports make our total foreign trade.

Total imports of 1916, $2,197,984,842, under a Democratic free-trade tariff distributed on the per cents free of duty and the per cents dutiable under the Republican protective-tariff acts for the years 1906, 1907, 1910, and 1913, with the customs-duties receipts for each year estimated at the average ad valorem rates on dutiable imports actually collected in those years showing the loss of revenue to be supplied by direct taxation under a Democratic administration.

Republican tariff applied to imports of 1916 for years named.

Total imports fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, $2,197,894,842.

Average ad valorem rate on dutiable imports under Republican tariff would have collected, applied in 1916 for years named, as follows:

Customs receipts if Republican protective rates were applied to dutiable imports, 1916.

1907—42.55 per cent of $1,211,040,048 producing 515,297,540
1910—41.52 per cent of $1,131,696,035 producing 469,880,193
1913—40.05 per cent of $1,000,701,522 producing 400,780,955

If total imports under Democratic tariff of October 3, 1913, had been 45.53 per cent, dutiable as in 1913, the last year of a Republican tariff, the dutiable imports for the years named below would have been as follows:

Year.	Total imports.	Dutiable.
1914	$1,893,925,657	$862,294,351
1915	1,674,169,749	762,249,482
1916	2,197,894,842	1,000,742,498

And at the average ad valorem rate of 40.05 per cent on dutiable imports for 1913, would have produced in customs:

1914 ..... $345,348,887
1915 305,280,917
1916 400,797,370

The foregoing estimated customs, compared with $211,866,222 actually collected in 1916, show why the difference of from $94,000,000 to nearly $190,000,000 must be met by direct taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.]

ANOTHER INADEQUATE REMEDY.

The Senate Finance Committee, bent on political preparedness, has adopted a provision for the alleged purpose of preventing discriminations against American trade "after the war." It authorizes the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to retaliate against any country which forbids the importation of American articles by forbidding imports from those countries. The provision is not broad enough to prevent any discrimination short of absolute prohibition of American imports. The last Congress deliberately discarded the maximum and minimum provisions of the Payne tariff, which gave the President the power to meet any discriminations against American goods. It was to gather data for guidance of the President in the discharge of this duty that the tariff board was created. The Democratic House of the Sixty-second Congress showed its opposition to this principle by refusing to continue appropriations for the support of the board. As soon as the Democrats got control of the White House and both Houses of Congress they threw the whole system overboard, notwithstanding the fact that most countries of the world had tariffs and that they could use them to our disadvantage.

There are already complete prohibitions against certain imports now in force, being provided by the British orders in council. Their pretense of military necessity is a humbug. They are designed primarily to foster British industries. The proposed remedy is inadequate, for after Congress adjourns the orders in council may be modified so as to levy a huge import duty. The President will be powerless to retaliate under the provision as adopted

But this is not the chief danger to American industries. That lies in a flood of European products following the war. No safeguard against this is provided by the pending measure, except as to dyestuffs and as to goods that are to be sold here at less than the current market price at home, with the criminal intent of establishing an American monopoly. For practical purposes this will afford no protection at all.

CAUSES OF PRESENT PROSPERITY.

The Democratic Party would like very much to make it appear that the Wilson administration is responsible for present business conditions. The reports of the Federal Government totally disprove such a claim.

The enormous crops of last year added approximately $500,000,000 more to the national wealth and circulation than did the crops of 1914. That, in itself, was enough to make a vast difference in relative prosperity. Neither Mr. Wilson, nor Mr. Wilson's policies, influenced agricultural production, although the Democrats are disposed to take credit for it. But figures just published by the Department of Commerce prove beyond all question that it is the war trade and the war trade alone that has expanded our foreign commerce far beyond all previous records and has made the country richer by many hundreds of millions.

In this report the exports and imports of 1913, 1914, and 1915 are presented by countries. The total exports in 1913 were $2,484,000,000; in 1915, $3,547,000,000, an increase of $1,063,000,000. All of this increase, and more, is shown by the report to be due to the sale of war munitions and supplies. Our exports to England were increased by $577,000,000, to France by $340,000,000, to Italy by $192,000,000, to Russia by $139,000,000, making a total increase to the allied countries of $1,248,000,000. To the countries bordering upon the war zone—Holland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Greece, and Switzerland—our exports increased $218,000,000, all of which is due to abnormal demand growing out of war. To suppose that our normal trade with these countries could be increased in the least under present conditions is manifestly absurd. Therefore we have a total gain in exports resulting from the war, of $1,466,000,000, as compared with 1913. Against this we have a loss, consequent upon the war, of $381,000,000 to Germany and Belgium, making a net gain from this cause of $1,085,000,000. Our exports to the rest of the world have decreased $22,000,000.

Our imports in 1913 amounted to $1,792,000,000; in 1915 to $1,778,000,000. Our balance of trade, therefore, in 1915 was $1,769,000,000. Directly or indirectly the country is that much richer; we have sold to foreign nations that much more than we have bought from them. The war brought us in 1915 an average of over $17 per capita for the entire population of the United States. Eliminating the sales to the allies and the border nations our balance of trade in 1915 is seen to be only $303,000,000. Our balance of trade in 1913 was $692,000,000. So it is apparent that, outside of war sales, we have lost almost $400,000,000.

It is quite plain from these official figures that every dollar of our gain from foreign commerce is due to the war demand, and that the war and the crops have given us a prosperity not because of but in spite of the Democratic administration.

BRITISH TO DROP FREE TRADE.

It has been known for years that sentiment in Great Britain for a protective tariff system has been growing. The late Mr. Chamberlain was an avowed advocate of protection. Even the most confirmed believers in Cobdenism admitted that England was at a disadvantage in the making of commercial treaties because it had nothing to give in return for concessions it asked. Although enjoying certain peculiar advantages in commerce with the British colonies, which have tariffs, some of the latter have been at times inclined to drive hard bargains with the mother country. But it was not until the great war came to show the folly of the millennial dreamers that protection sentiment became crystallized. At a meeting of the Association of Chambers of Commerce in London this week, attended by 1,000 delegates, a resolution was adopted unanimously to the effect that the experience of the war has shown "that the strength and safety of the British nation in time of national peril lie in the possession by this nation of the power to produce its requirements from its own soil and its own factories, rather than in the possession of values which may be exported and exchanged for products and manufactures of foreign countries."

Washington, Hamilton, Clay, Lincoln, Blaine, and McKinley adopted this theory. The American principle of diversifying industries in this country was adhered to in spite of free-trade dreamers, who would have left this country dependent upon its agricultural resources, as they imagined "nature intended." Our great trade now would have been impossible had free-trade theories prevailed. Our chief difficulty is that we did not go far enough. We should have built up the dye industry, for example. But many of our most thriving industries were built up by protection, over the protest of free traders, who contended that they could never be made a success in this country.

When this war ends there will not be a free-trade country left in the world. Each will strive to develop its own interests and there will be the most intricate tariffs and the framing of commercial treaties will require the most accurate information and the keenest wits on the part of statesmen.

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of July 14, 1916.]

A LONESOME FREE-TRADE COUNTRY.

The importations into the United States for the 11 months ending June 1 amounted to $1,952,033,212, of which $1,338,892,072, more than two-thirds, paid no duty. In 1914 the imports for the same period were $1,736,396,207, of which $1,034,056,637 were admitted free. It will thus be seen that the free imports have increased the enormous amount of $304,835,435 in two years. In the same time the dutiable imports have decreased close to $90,000,000. In 1911, under the Payne-Aldrich law, the free imports were 50 per cent of the total. Now, under the Democratic tariff they are 70 per cent of the whole. While our revenue-producing imports are dwindling, the quantity of free goods dumped on our shores is increasing at an appalling rate. These figures are taken from the official reports of the Department of Commerce.

It is plain, then, that the law that is obstensibly a revenue measure is nothing of the sort. It is, in effect, a free-trade law, putting into actual operation the foundation principle of the Democratic Party. The United States is now, in fact, a free-trade country. While practically all the rest of the world has accepted and adopted the protection principle, our country has moved in the opposite direction, going backward instead of forward. Great Britain and Holland are the only two other countries still holding to free trade, and Great Britain is preparing to abandon that iridescent theory in a commercial combination with her allies. Soon, unless the people turn its face in the other direction, the United States will have none but little Holland to keep it company, and the story of the 10 little Indians will approach its climax.

Is there no lesson in these facts? Is the unanimous conclusion of virtually all the nations of the earth, founded upon the experience and judgment of those nations, of no value to us? Are we to stand alone as the one land whose gates are wide open to the commerce of the world, the one land which refuses to protect its people from the competition of other countries? Are we to continue to hold fast to a discarded and discredited doctrine because the Democratic Party persists in its blunders? We think not. We are sure we shall not. November will answer these questions.

THE BLINDNESS OF DEMOCRACY.

It is one of the congenital failings of the Democratic Party that it always blames Providence for the inevitably disastrous consequences of its tariff legislation. Never in the checkered career of the United States has there been a Democratic tariff law enacted that did not put the country upon its back, and yet the Democratic Party continues to say that if it hadn't been for this or if it hadn't been for that, Providence alone being responsible, prosperity beyond computation would have surely followed the enactment. All of the rest of the world—England and Holland alone excepted among civilized countries—has established the protective tariff as a permanent principle of government, and England is moving rapidly toward its adoption. The Democratic Party in the United States is numerically the strongest support that the vanishing theory of free trade yet retains upon the earth. And the Democratic Party hangs to it because it obstinately refuses to accept the evidences of its own senses. It looks, but it will not see. It listens, but it will not hear.

And now we are gravely told that the calamitous results of the Underwood tariff before the European war opened were due to a drought in 1913. It does not matter that the crop of 1913 was short only in comparison with the record-breaking crop of 1912; it does not matter that it was in fact an average crop, greater than that of 1911, nor that it brought higher prices and sold, on the whole, for some $200,000,000 more than the total crop of 1912. Providence must shoulder the responsibility. In other parts of the world the people have learned from experience. Many were enamored with the theories of free trade, but they were convinced of its fallacy by the weight of proof. Premier Hughes, of Australia, said not long ago: "When fiscalism was a live question in Australia I was a free trader of free traders. The 'Wealth of Nations' was my Bible; Adam Smith was my prophet." Experience changed his views. "I am no more concerned to deny," he says, "that a case can be made out in favor of allowing trade to flow along what are termed its 'natural channels' than I am to deny the virtues of the Spartan methods of producing a virile nation by exposing its weaklings to certain death. Much might be said for both, but modern sentiment is definitely against the one and the inexorable circumstances of the modern world are against the other."

Some of these days the Democratic Party will learn that it is not Providence but "the inexorable circumstances of the modern world" that are against its pet policy.

FACING THE COMMERCIAL FUTURE.

Not everybody is hugging the delusion that the present enormous export trade is a normal development and that it will be permanent. Mr. Hughes has aptly called those who do dwellers in a fools' paradise. The National Foreign Trade Council is not indulging in such idle dreams. It is facing the future with its eyes open. It is planning for strengthening American commerce. One of the ways is by exempting our foreign trade from the operations of the Sherman Act, so as to permit American exporters to fight European competitors on equal terms. There is much merit in their proposal, but we are especially interested just now in the succinct statement the council's committee on cooperation in foreign trade makes concerning our present abnormal foreign trade. It declares that the excess of exports rests largely on the following circumstances:

"Abnormal war demand and prices for munitions, foodstuffs, and raw materials.

"Elimination of normal European competition through occupation of European factories in munitions production.

"Loss of labor through enlistment or conscription and belligerent restriction of normal exportation.

"Curtailment of investment of European capital in neutral markets, normally a stimulus to European export trade."

The statement continues:

"No greater fallacy is possible than to neglect to expect after the war the following developments:

"Cessation of war demand and prices for munitions, reduction of prevailing high prices for exported foodstuffs and raw materials by reason of restored European competition, normal transportation, and international movement of raw materials.

"Resumption of normal European competition in home and neutral markets by reason of return of soldiers to industry and the lifting of military embargoes from exportation.

"Renewed activity of European export and import combinations, with increased governmental support and possible preferential tariff and navigation arrangements under economic alliances.

"Renewal, as rapidly as business conditions and national, or even international, fiscal policy will permit, of European investment in neutral markets, the most effective method of creating a foreign preference for merchandise of leading nations. European war finance has been molded to protect trade-winning foreign investments; their nourishment will not be neglected with peace."

There is no evading these plain facts. This is not the argument of politicians, but of business men who have large investments which they are trying to safeguard.

[From the St. Louis Daily Globe-Democrat of Aug. 16, 1916.]

"KEEPING US OUT OF WAR."

Secretary of War Newton D. Baker is authority for the statement that "keeping the United States out of war" is the principal claim upon which President Wilson bases his fight for reelection. "The fact that we are at peace," he says, "is the greatest argument of all for President Wilson."

It is true that we are at peace, although our entire Army is massed upon the Mexican border; but the extent to which Mr. Wilson is to be credited with our peacefulness is a proper subject of inquiry. Are we at peace because of him and his acts or in spite of him and his acts? Let us consider. In the first place, no nation has sought a quarrel with the United States. No deed has been done, no word has been said of direct enmity toward the United States. With nations, as with individuals, it takes two to make a quarrel. There are but two countries with which our relations have been strained during the administration of Mr. Wilson. The acts of Germany which incurred our displeasure were committed in the course of a war with another nation and were not directed against us. Germany has at no time shown a desire to come into conflict with this country. The only possibility of war with Germany was in consequence of demands coming from us. It was we, not Germany, who were threatening war. But, as a matter of cold fact, President Wilson could not have got us into actual war with Germany if he had deliberately tried to do so. For obvious reasons Germany could not have fought us, and, for reasons equally obvious, we cold not have fought Germany unless we had joined with the allies, an inconceivable possibility. We might have had a theoretical state of war, but not a gun would have been fired, not a drum would have sounded. Mr. Wilson did not keep us out of war with Germany. Circumstances utterly beyond his control or direction attended to that.

Mr. Wilson did not keep us out of war with Mexico. The only danger of war with that country has grown out of the acts of Mr. Wilson himself. At the beginning of his administration nothing was further from the thought of Mexico than war with the United States. Its people, its intelligent people, realized that the friendship of this country was necessary to their peace and prosperity. A firm demand for the protection of our rights and interests would have been respected and obeyed without recourse to arms, if we had not made that protection impossible by our unwarranted interference in the internal affairs of Mexico. Our blundering, untactful, unjustifiable course during the past three years has made enemies out of those who desired to be our friends, and because of that enmity our troops are arrayed upon the border. The question of war or peace with Mexico is yet to be settled, but if it should be peace, as we earnestly hope, Mr. Wilson will deserve no encomiums for avoiding the consequences of his own errors.

TWO YEARS OF BRITISH SNUBS—UNITED STATES UNRUFFLED—DIPLOMATIC RECORD SHOWS CONTRAST IN WILSON'S ATTITUDE TOWARD BELLIGERENTS—JOHN BULL WINS 10, LOSES 1.

[By Arthur Seats Henning]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 22.

While President Wilson is threatening to sever diplomatic relations with Berlin because of German disregard of the rights and safety of Americans on the high seas Great Britain continues its depredations upon American foreign trade and its defiance of the sovereignty and dignity of the United States.

The President has arraigned Great Britain in unsparing language as a violator of international law, but has taken no step more drastic than the lodgment of protests to enforce observance of the American rights England has disregarded. In only 1 of 11 disputes has the President induced the British Government to change its policy.

LIVES VERSUS DOLLARS.

Critics of the President point to this record as proof of their charge that he is prone to be lenient with Great Britain and severe with Germany; that he is prejudiced in favor of the British cause and has carried this prejudice into an unneutral policy; and that he is either unconsciously or deliberately "playing England's game."

Defenders of the President resent these charges and insinuations. If, they say, the President appears to be dealing more harshly with Germany than with Great Britain it is because Germany has caused the irreparable sacrifice of American lives, while England has occasioned only the reparable loss of profits and property. Human life, they argue, can not be weighed in the same scale as commercial dollars.

ENGLAND'S STEADY DISDAIN.

Nevertheless, with a rupture of diplomatic relations and eventual war with Germany a possibility of the near future, the United States faces the prospect of becoming the ally of a power that has treated its interests and rights with contumely ever since the beginning of the great struggle in Europe.

The disputes between the United States and Great Britain and their disposition or present status may be summarized as follows:

Demand that British merchantmen cease the use of the American flag to deceive German submarine commanders—compliance refused by British Government.

Protest against the establishment of an illegal and unprecedented contraband system—still maintained in spite of the remonstrance of this Government.

Protest against the maintenance of an illegal blockade by Great Britain of the neutral ports of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland—still maintained in spite of these protests.

Dispute by the United States of the right of Great Britain to control the shipping of neutral nations by refusing to allow their products to proceed to friendly ports without sanction of the British Admiralty—protests ignored in part and practice defended on the ground of military expediency.

Protest against the seizure of approximately 2,000 ships carrying American products and detained in British ports at tremendous cost to the American charters: System still continued.

Protest against the violation of American sovereignty and interference with the internal affairs of this country by dictating to ship companies plying between American and ports of friendly countries and blacklisting as "undesirable" American merchants who have ever dealt with persons in the central Empires: Protest not pressed because of the lack of official proof of these practices.

BEFORE PRIZE COURTS.

Protest against the seizure of four American ships on charges that they were "tainted" with part German ownership: Cases now before British prize courts.

Protest against the seizure and detention of American mails, including diplomatic correspondence and securities: Practice defended and continued by the British Government on the ground that the mails have been used for the transport of contraband, but pledges given that diplomatic and legitimate personal correspondence will not be interfered with.

Protest against the holding up of American ships and the arrest of passengers of German birth: Protest ignored on the ground that in the specific instances complained of the persons arrested were known to be German reservists.

ONE PROTEST RECOGNIZED.

Protest against the violation of American neutrality by the invasion of the 3-mile international limit by British warships and the improper use of the wireless telegraph: Apologies made and practices discontinued.

Protest against the prohibition by Great Britain on importations of goods to England for the manifest purpose of attempting permanently to destroy American trade with Europe: Protest ignored and practice daily increasing.

Trade secrets have been taken over by the British, who have studied American methods, listed every buyer of American goods in Europe, illegally increased her list of prohibited exports, seized and paid for American goods which have been sold to neutral countries as English goods, all to the obvious disadvantage of the American manufacturer both during and after the war and in promotion of the British policy of permanently controlling the markets of the world.

ENGLAND WORLD DICTATOR.

The practice of Great Britain in seizing all cargoes intended for neutral countries contiguous to the central Empires has practically put the whole of Europe upon a ration basis, with England determining the amount each is to have.

Since the beginning of the war 149 notes, memoranda, representations, and formal telegrams have been passed between Washington and London. Of these, 59 have originated in Washington and 91 in London. These messages have been compiled by the State Department as relating to important issues in dispute between the two Governments. The tabulation, however, represents less than 5 per cent of the informal notes and cablegrams which have actually passed between the United States' Department of State and the British Foreign Office covering matters of relatively minor importance arising from day to day.

Tabulated in chronological order, the general issues between the United States and Great Britain, with the official correspondence relating to each specific instance, have been as follows:

August 5 (the second day of the war): Ambassador Page reported to the State Department that Great Britain had promulgated a list of articles which would be treated as contraband and conditional contraband during the progress of hostilities.

September 30. The United States received its first official warning that Great Britain had decided to substitute military expediency for law by changing the contraband lists adopted by it so as to include articles not hitherto regarded as contraband—copper, lead, glycerin, ferrochrome, hematite iron ore, magnetic iron ore, skins, hide, and rubber.

October 29: Great Britain increased list of contraband by an order in council which decreed that all goods shipped "to order" to the countries adjacent to the central powers were liable to seizure unless the owners could prove that they were not destined to reach "enemy countries."

It was this order which provoked the first protest of the United States against the innovation to international law introduced by England and one that has not, even after 18 months, been adjusted to the satisfaction of the United States.

December 26: Inspired by a flood of demands from American ship owners that the United States protest against the raids on American commerce, President Wilson sent his first formal note to London demanding that the rights of American citizens be respected. The President displayed deep chagrin at the failure of the British Government to pay proper attention to the specific complaints made by this Government from time to time. The British Government pleaded as an excuse the exigencies of the disorganized situation provoked by the war. In his note the President revealed in a general way the activities of Britain's warships and demanded their practices be stopped.

January 8: Sir Edward Grey, the British Foreign Minister, replying to this note of the President, said: "His Majesty's Government cordially concurs in the principle enunciated by the Government of the United States that a belligerent in dealing in trade between neutrals should not be interfered with unless that interference is necessary to protect the belligerent's national safety, and then only to the extent which it is necessary. We shall endeavor to keep our action within the limits of this principle upon the understanding that it permits our right to interfere when such interference is not with bona fide trade between the United States and another neutral country, but in trade in contraband designed for the enemies' country we are ready whenever our action may unintentionally exceed this principle to make redress."

March 1. Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, the British ambassador at Washington, formally notified the State Department that in retaliation for the submarine warfare adopted by Germany, it had decided to prevent commodities of any kind from reaching or leaving Germany.

March 11: In meeting this second stage of the controversy over the rights of Americans on the high seas the United States demanded an explanation of the new policy adopted by the allies.

March 22: In his reply to the representations made by the United States Sir Edward Grey evaded the main issue and fell back upon the statement that the new policy of Great Britain and her allies had become necessary as a retaliatory measure against Germany for her treatment of Belgium and France, together with her submarine policy.

March 13. An order in council practically set aside the sovereign rights of all neutrals without legalizing the action by announcing an actual blockade.

March 30: The United States Government protested at great length against the policy of Great Britain to treat neutral shipping as if a blockade of German ports actually existed. The President took the position that the orders in council "would constitute a practical assertion of unlimited control of belligerents' rights over neutral commerce within the whole European area, and an almost unqualified denial of the sovereign rights of nations at peace.

June 22: Lord Crewe, acting British minister of foreign affairs, addressed a note to the United States Government dealing at length with the complaints made by it. He insisted American shippers had received fair treatment at the hands of the British Admiralty and that little pecuniary loss had actually resulted to Americans from the operations of orders in council.

July 14: Secretary Lansing notified the British Government that the United States would not respect the decisions of the British prize courts on the ground that they were operating under the orders in council, which in themselves were illegal. The obvious purpose of this communication was to pave the way for a general diplomatic discussion of the various claims of shipowners after the war.

October 21: Secretary Lansing addressed to Sir Edward Grey the final demands of the United States that the orders in council be vacated. Attached to his demand was an appendix giving the names of more than 300 vessels which had been taken into British ports and detained for indefinite periods on various pretexts. The list covered only cases arising between March 11 and June 16, 1915.

December 23: The seizure by the British Government on the Holland-American steamship Nieuw Amsterdam of mails intended for the United States provoked a protest from this Government.

January 4: Secretary Lansing followed with another note of protest to Great Britain instancing the seizure of mails from the United States to the Scandinavian countries on the steamships Stockholm, United States, Frederick VIII, and Helig Olav.

January 19: Great Britain promulgated an order known as an extension of the "trading with the enemy act," by which persons, "though not resident or carrying on business in enemy territory by reason of their enemy nationality or associations," are excluded from doing business with England, which means with all of the countries affected by the present British "blockade." This act was aimed at Germans and firms of German capitalization in the United States.

MUST PROVE INNOCENCE.

March 30: Ambassador Page informed the State Department that an amendment to the orders in council had been promulgated for the purpose of carrying out "an absolute blockade" of neutral ports, based apparently upon the theory of "continuous voyage." An unofficial report of the text of the order stated that "that provision of the declaration of London shall not be deemed to limit or to have limited in any way the right of His Majesty, in accordance with the law of nations, to capture goods on the law that they are contraband or to have affected the liability of conditional contraband to the carriage of the goods to their destination redirect or entail transshipment or subsequent transport by land." The order concludes with the statement "that it shall lie upon the owners of goods to prove that their destination was innocent."

PATIENTLY WAITING.

What the United States most desires is an answer to the communication sent by Secretary Lansing on October 21 last demanding that the British Government change its methods of dealing with American commerce. It is anticipated that when the British Government finally makes up its mind to reply its answer will merely attempt to justify the action of the commanders of warships which have been seizing American vessels and cargoes ever since the outbreak of the war.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish also to call attention to the fact that this gentleman named Keegan, who delivered himself of an interview in St. Louis three weeks ago, does not appear to be quite as unjustified as the public thought, because I have now to offer practically the same kind of interview from President Wilson that Keegan, attached to the Labor Bureau, gave out at St. Louis three weeks ago, and which I put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a week or two ago.

Mr. Keegan said that he would welcome the day when the Government would take the railroads, and he said that they would never go back to private owners because the Government would continue, and we would have Government ownership of railways. He welcomed the strike because it would hasten the day of Government ownership. That same threat is in the address made by President Wilson to the railway managers on the question whether the strike shall be declared or whether they will settle it. He threatened them in substance with the Government ownership of railways if they did not yield the control of their property. So I ask that this among the others be incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

YIELD OR FACE UNITED STATES OWNERSHIP, WILSON WARNS—PRESIDENT TELLS RAILROAD CHIEFS PUBLIC MAY DEMAND FEDERAL OPERATION OF ROADS.

The chairmen of the big four brotherhoods, by a vote of approximately 3 to 1, yesterday accepted President Wilson's plan to avert the threatened railway strike.

Thirty-one executives declared they stood by the managers' committee and were opposed to settlement by any means other than arbitration.

President Wilson, in a spirited reply, warned the railway chiefs that they were risking governmental ownership of all railroads. He added that he personally did not favor Government ownership, but that public opinion might demand the reform.

The President in vigorous terms advised the railroads to accept his plan—the eight-hour day and investigation by commission of collateral issues—if they wished to avert Government intervention by force.

He reminded them of the threatened strike in France two years ago, when the French Government called the employees to the colors and then detailed them to operate the railroads.

The President's more specific suggestion was that the railroads operate under the eight-hour-day plan for a year, pending investigation by a special commission to be created by Congress.

The President laid emphasis upon the danger of bringing about Government ownership of railroads by a great railway strike which might force the Government to take over the operations of the roads in the national interest. He stressed the fact that a national railway strike would open up the whole question of Government ownership of railroads because the private management of them had failed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also wish to incorporate an extract from a letter written by President Wilson to John Brisben Walker the 26th day of February, 1912. Mr. Walker had written him a very complimentary letter saying that Mr. Wilson was more progressive than he thought, and he had been wrong about the gentleman; he did not get a good view of him in the classic shades of Princeton, but since he had gotten out where the glare of the limelight was on him it illuminated his progressive principles, so that Mr. Walker was satisfied.

In reply the President wrote him a letter, February 26, 1912, saying it was very kind of him and afforded him much pleasure to read it, and he said:

Your generous letter of February 19 has gratified me very deeply indeed. It is indeed true that things are perfectly plain to me now which formerly I could not see at all.

I have no doubt of it.

Then a clipping from Representative SISSON, in which he talks about the rampant tendency of his own party. He is from Mississippi.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Principle has gone to the four winds of the earth, and we are writing ourselves down in the history of the country as being the most outrageously and most criminally extravagant Congress that ever sat on the American Continent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Another from Mr. Messenger a few days ago, who is a newspaper man traveling with Gov. Hughes on his tour over the country. It relates to the lumber and shingle industry of Washington. I wish to insert that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HOW THE TARIFF HURTS.

Washington is essentially a protectionist State and has suffered actual loss by the Democratic tariff, which has not been offset, as in some other Commonwealths, by temporary war prosperity. The State has shared very little in the industrial prosperity engendered in this country by the war.

It has, however, seen millions of dollars' worth of British Columbia shingles and lumber, cut from raw material which was 20 per cent cheaper than theirs and manufactured by coolie and Hindu cheap labor, pass the very mills of its lumbermen to compete in American markets under the reduced tariff. It has seen New Zealand butter, Argentine beef, and eggs from China sold in Seattle markets lower than home-raised products, being admitted free of duty. The lumber trade is in straits, and the workingmen charge it to the Democratic tariff.

Mr. Hughes, in his speech here, said to his audience that he didn't have to talk tariff, as every man in the crowd knew the subject thoroughly from practical everyday business experience. The audience assented.

Progressives are in the main protectionists in Washington, and many a lumberman who is a Democrat from principle looks ruefully at the practical operations of the tariff of his party.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish also to insert an article from the Washington Post:

WAR TO DRIVE PEOPLE OF BRITAIN BACK TO THE LAND; ENGLAND MUST FEED HERSELF IS THE NEW SLOGAN—INCREASED CROP AREAS OF GRAIN ALREADY REPORTED—SHORTAGE OF LABOR MET BY WOMEN, DESPITE OPPOSITION—PLANS UNDER WAY TO REPOPULATE COUNTRYSIDES WITH SOLDIERS AND SAILORS WHEN MEN RETURN FROM THE FRONT.

[Correspondence of the Associated Press.]

LONDON, July 20.

One of the effects of the war will be seen in a great revival of agricultural life in England and the United Kingdom. The outbreak of the conflict caught the British Isles dependent on foreign commerce for four-fifths of their food supply, barring meat, of which between 60 and 70 per cent is produced at home.

The motto of a few years ago, "Back to the land," thus has given way to the slogan, "England must feed herself." Lord Selborne, the leader of the crusade, declares that the attainment of this object is the country's sacred duty, and he emphasizes the point that the farmer can do as much for the country as the soldier in the trenches.

Plans for the great reform include a number of important measures that are to be put into effect at the earliest possible moment. They include the following:

1. The repopulation of the rural districts and afforestation. The war office has just consented to the exchange of many of the older men who in the earlier days of the war left farm work for the firing line for men between 19 and 30 to take their places at the front. This exchange will begin immediately.

2. The setting aside of thousands of acres for the settlement on the cooperative plan of England's soldiers and sailors after the war. This expediency is provided for by the small-holding colonies' act, now half way through Parliament. The scheme will provide for model villages, better housing, with a garden to every cottage, reading rooms, libraries, and good schools. Conceived by Lord Selborne, the idea has aroused so much enthusiasm that a wide demand has been made for increasing the land to be devoted to it by almost as much again as is specified in the bill.

3. The importation of natives from South Africa for agricultural labor during the remainder of the war, though so many objections have been raised to this that there is little likelihood of its being adopted.

LABOR FROM THE FRONT.

It is believed that the plan for bringing back soldiers from the front will have the effect of providing sufficient farm labor practically immediately. In announcing the war office's consent to the transfers, an expert told the agricultural society that in England and Scotland, as well as in Ireland, the farms in many districts had fallen far below their minimum needs in the matter of labor.

The tendency to regard more seriously the country's capacity for growing larger crops is illustrated by the figures of the wheat, barley, and oats crops in England and Wales. Wheat and oats were grown in larger quantities, though the barley crops were much smaller. There were 5,489,939 acres devoted to the three cereals in England and Wales in 1915, an increase of 248,044 acres, as compared with 1914. The greatest increase in acreage was devoted to wheat, or 2,170,170 acres in all, the figures representing an increase of 362,672 acres (20 per cent) greater than in 1914, and 25 per cent greater than during any of the years between 1905 and 1915. Every country returned increased areas, the total for Wales of 11,023 acres (31 per cent) being the greatest.

INCREASE IN OATS ALSO.

The returns for 1915 give 2,088,047 acres under oats, an increase of 158,421 acres, as compared with 1914, but only 24,869 acres above the average for the past 10 years. The whole of this increase was in England. The reduction of the areas under barley amounted to 158,421 acres, the total acreage of 1,231,722 being the lowest yet recorded.

Perhaps to no individual as much as to the Earl of Selborne is due the credit of bringing home to the people of all classes the importance of taking prompt means of making the country more nearly self-supporting in foodstuffs. In all of his addresses in recent years he has laid stress on the point. A practical farmer and enthusiast on his large and fertile tract in Hampshire, he has been able to meet the objections of opponents of expert knowledge to the great advantage of his crusade.

As undersecretary for the colonies between 1895 and 1900, as well as during his term of office as high commissioner of South Africa immediately after the war, he had further opportunity of enlarging his knowledge as to agriculture.

PEOPLE RESPONDING WELL.

Just before resigning as president of the board of agriculture the other day as a matter of principle, due to his views on the Irish question, Lord Selborne consented to review briefly the situation as to agriculture in an interview with a representative of the Associated Press.

"I have been highly gratified by the ready response of the people generally to the idea of making the country more nearly self-supporting from the soil," he said. "I have made my plea for the cultivation of the soil on the grounds of patriotism; the farmers and laborers came forward first to meet the emergency, and then the girls and women from the villages and even cities—some of the best type of women, including many of independent means, answering my call out of pure, unadulterated patriotism.

"These women have taken to the soil enthusiastically and with the intelligence that seems to characterize everything they are undertaking. They are living like laborers and are doing remarkably well all of the farm laborer's work—milking and feeding and looking after the stock like veterans. Many of these even have mastered the work of handling horses, and can get as much work out of a team as any man.

"Because of the splendid manner in which the women have risen to the occasion in this respect at a time when farm work is of vital importance to the nation, we feel justified in the belief that we are going to pull agriculture through this crisis in spite of many apparently insuperable difficulties.

"We realize that the problem of making as much progress as we should in war time presents its handicaps. Among these, in addition to the shortage of farm labor already indicated, is the difficulty of obtaining sufficient supplies of fertilizers and modern machinery that are so necessary in farming to the greatest advantage now. Then there is the shortage in shipping tonnage, restricting at many turns our requirements in the matter of supplies from overseas.

"We have asked the farmer to maintain the full cultivation of the soil and the upkeep of his flocks and herds during the course of the war, and to increase them whenever possible. Under the unparalleled difficulties encountered he has responded wonderfully. The difficulties of this particular season will be understood, in view of our efforts to replace with women the men absent from the soil.

OPPOSE WOMEN IN FIELDS.

"Owing to the custom being against women working on the land in England, the problem has been particularly difficult. The English type of farm laborer is highly skilled and a fine fellow. He would rather have his womenfolk looking after the home and maintaining the children and working less about the farm.

"The only English counties in which exception is found to this attitude or where women work habitually on the land are Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, and parts of Durham.

"Of course, there is a distinction betwen what countries with highly centralized governments, like those of France and Germany, can accomplish in such a change in national life as we are attempting here in England and in what we can accomplish. I refer to their facilities for quick organization. In France, for instance, there is a prefect in every department and a mayor in every commune, while practically the whole of Germany's population is at the order of the Government. What those countries can do by compulsion we must accomplish by voluntary and spontaneous effort. And the machine here, therefore, is necessarily slower.

"But the spirit of the people here is aroused and, as usual when that is so, the desired result is bound to follow.

"While we are not as well equipped in this respect of agricultural colleges as a country of larger rural population, like the United States, we are paying State grants to institutions scattered over the entire country that are directing their energies into this vital channel of instructing the people in the art of agriculture. When they are further along in their task our goal of accomplishing the repopulation of the agricultural districts will be simplified, if not solved. Likewise a splendid impetus will be given the work of afforestation, so badly needed throughout the country.

DECLINE IN BRITISH FARMING.

"Cambridge University and schools and colleges at Leeds, Bristol, and Reading are among the institutions that are aiding in this work of training our future farmers.

"But perhaps the condition to which farming had dropped in the United Kingdom may be better understood by a reference to its history. It must be remembered first that up to the time of the passing of the great reform bill, in 1832, land in this country was a source of great political power.

"The bill's effect in transferring the basis of power from land ownership was manifested gradually, and that depression which was the greatest catastrophe in the history of agriculture did not begin until the end of the seventies. That was with the fall in the price of wheat to 24 shillings a quarter, and of corn and other farm produce in proportion. Farming, of course, ceased to be a business proposition.

"Millions of pounds were lost and thousands of farmers were absolutely ruined. Conditions remained very bad for farming for 35 years.

"Owing to a variety of causes, an improvement occurred between 1900 and 1905. This improvement was being maintained and was increasing when the war broke out. Although it had placed the farmer so he was making a good commercial profit 10 years before the war, every year saw less land under cultivation and more acres devoted to grass. The increase in the areas going to grass was due to the fact that farmers could make a good living in that way with less risk and the memory of the terrible experience of the depression."

WILL CONTINUE HIS WORK.

Lord Selborne will have something to do with the revival of agriculture, even now that he has resigned his place as president of the board of agriculture, as the prime minister has invited him to cooperate with him in the task of reconstruction of agriculture after the war.

Speaking before the Agricultural Organization Society, Lord Selborne said:

"Increased food production during the war is a sacred national duty. The man on a Hampshire farm can strike a blow for England equally with his son in Flanders. The manner in which women have responded to the call of duty in this war should make it impossible for any man to think them less patriotic, less capable of comprehending a great issue, less firm in purpose, or less prone to sacrifice than men."

He made a plea for better wages for farm laborers, better houses, and for a multiplication of the occupying owners of land drawn from the laboring classes.

I wish also to quote an article from the Protectionist, entitled "The death of free trade":

Reginald McKenna, chancellor of the exchequer, and Bonar Law, colonial secretary, speaking, respectively, for the Liberal and Unionist members of the cabinet, have announced that the British Government will join its allies in such a movement. The self-governing dominions of the British Empire have long ago repudiated the free-trade policy of the mother country, and have erected tariff walls even against English goods. India threatens revolution unless she is allowed to do the same.

The frankest confession of this change of mind and the clearest expression of the reasons for it comes from Premier Hughes, of Australia, who took part in the Paris conference. In an address to the British Imperial Chamber of Commerce he said:

"I certainly approach the matter without bias against what is called free trade. When fiscalism was a live question in Australia I was a free trader of free traders. The 'Wealth of Nations' was my Bible; Adam Smith was my prophet. But it was always disconcerting to me to see how blind the world has been to the great virtues of free trade. Tried by this standard, it would appear that Britain was the only country in the world that was in step!

"But if it were a question of trade only affecting our pockets, the fiscal question might fairly be left to settle itself. But it reaches down into the very roots of our lives. You can not proceed upon the assumption that the economic policy of a nation has no relation to its national welfare. The relations between the two are inseparable, intimate, and complex. This fact is fundamental; to ignore it is not only to invite but to insure national destruction. For a time the trade of a nation that treats trade as if it had no connection with national safety may make great strides, as did ours, but there comes a day of reckoning to such nations, as it has come to us.

"I am no more concerned to deny that a case can be made out in favor of allowing trade to flow along what are termed its natural channels than I am to deny the virtues of the Spartan method of producing a virile nation by exposing its weaklings to certain death. Much might be said for both, but modern sentiment is definitely against the one and the inexorable circumstances of the modern world are against the other."

The present and prospective abandonment by Great Britain of the policy on which its commercial dominance has been built up leaves Holland as the only free-trade nation in the world. Holland is quite a country when the tide is out, but in comparison with others it constitutes hardly more of an exception than the Freibezirk or free port district of Hamburg.

Up to 1860 it seemed likely that free trade would sweep over the world. But the tide has been ebbing ever since. In 1861 the Morrill tariff bill was passed as a war measure, and protection was more firmly intrenched by the McKinley bill of 1890 and the Dingley bill of 1897. The Wilson bill of 1894 and the Underwood bill of 1913 made some reduction in the duties, but left the principle of protection essentially unshaken. France had been tending toward free trade up to the Franco-Prussian War, but after that turned in the other direction, and the tariff laws of 1881 and 1892 were planned deliberately as protective rather than revenue measures. Italy, Austria, Belgium, Switzerland, and Spain changed their policy during the same period in the same direction. The Prussian policy has always been protection, so much so that one is tempted to translate Hohenzollern as "high tariff." The German Empire grew out of a customs union, the Zollverein of 1831, and it must be admitted that it has prospered as much commercially under protection as its great rival, England, has under the opposite policy.

The war, by increasing the fiscal burdens and by intensifying the national spirit, will drive in the same direction, and we can not expect any country to stand out against it. Free trade is undeniably dead, and whether we may hope for a resurrection depends upon the strength of our faith in the coming of the great day when all artificial barriers between the nations shall be removed.

Also, a letter from Edward A. Woods, president National Association of Life Underwriters:

AUGUST 21, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHERMAN: I inclose copy of protest against increase in tax upon life insurance, which I have to-day sent to Senator F. M. SIMMONS and the President of the United States, also copy of paper referred to therein.

Yours, very truly,

EDWARD A. WOODS,
President.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

AUGUST 21, 1916.

The National Association of Life Underwriters, representing through its membership over 6,000 representatives of life insurance companies, in all sections of the country, and indirectly the 125,000 life insurance salesmen in the country, interested not for themselves but for their 28,000,000 policyholders, respectfully protests against the increase from 1 per cent to 2 per cent of the tax upon policyholders of American life insurance.

We make this protest in behalf of our clients. Life insurance will be sold whether taxed or not, because it is a necessity, but we object to the radical departure from the practice of every other nation in imposing upon 28,000,000 thrifty American policyholders, themselves endeavoring to avoid the burden of dependency that would otherwise fall heavier upon the State.

The 28,000,000 policyholders constitute more than a majority of the voters of this country.

How can the imposition in peaceful America of such taxation as is proposed by no war-ridden country in the world be defended?

Recently in South Africa, upon the suggestion of imposing a tax on life insurance, the members of Parliament were immediately polled and over two-thirds at once telegraphed their opposition to this measure, notwithstanding the great need of this part of the British Empire.

The Canadian Minister of Finance has stated that life insurance will be the last thing that Canada would attempt to tax.

England exempts the amount paid for life insurance up to one-sixth of a man's income.

Germany is contributing heavily by a governmental aid to compulsory life insurance.

How can peaceful America defend penalizing its thrifty, provident insurers, when the same kind of thrift is being encouraged by all the rest of the world?

What possible defense can there be in properly exempting those carrying 8,000,000 policies in assessment companies and yet imposing a tax upon the over 40,000,000 policies carried in companies, 90 per cent of which are doing business entirely on the mutual plan, and in all of which cases the tax falls entirely upon the policyholders?

The defense can not be made by anyone familiar with the subject that this tax falls upon anyone else than the policyholder and increases the cost of his life insurance or diminishes its amount.

We beg respectfully to resubmit a paper presented to the President of the United States and many Members of both Houses when a previous finance bill was before Congress, which resulted in the exemption of some proposed taxation of life insurance policyholders.

We submit the memorandum unchanged, because all the facts presented therein are of even greater force to-day, particularly in view of the fact that with most of Europe driven to discover every new possible source of revenue they are not penalizing life insurance, as is proposed in peaceful America.

Shall the 125,000 active and aggressive life-insurance salesmen in all sections of the country, coming into daily contact with their 28,000,000 policyholders, be obliged to explain that the future increased cost of their insurance is due to such unusual action on the part of the present Congress?

Very truly, yours, ——— ———, President.

TAXING OF LIFE INSURANCE UNECONOMIC IN PRINCIPLE.

(Evidenced by: ——— ———.)

I. NATURE OF BUSINESS.

Life insurance in its essence is not a money-making enterprise, but a method of distributing a loss by combining large numbers of people.

It promotes thrift and reduces poverty and a consequent burden of dependents upon the State.

II. EXEMPTION OF KINDRED INSTITUTIONS.

Mutual savings banks are properly exempted. Page 26, lines 17–18.

Domestic building and loan associations are properly exempted. Line 25.

Fraternal life insurance companies are properly exempted. Lines 19–24.

Regular life insurance companies, with whom 25,000,000 Americans carry nearly 35,000,000 policies for $18,000,000,000—an average of $550 each and paying annually but $20 each—are included.

Large numbers of these companies—transacting 90 per cent of the life insurance business of the country—and especially the largest of them, are absolutely mutual companies, having none but the policyholders who can possibly pay this tax. Other companies are specifically required to conduct the life insurance branch of their business on the mutual plan, distributing all profits to policyholders. In all companies, of course, the ultimate tax falls finally and directly upon the policyholders.

III. TAXATION OF LIFE INSURANCE CONSISTENTLY AND UNIFORMLY OPPOSED BY—

(A) Economists: John Stuart Mill declares that a tax on life insurance "is a direct discouragement of prudence and forethought." (Principles of Political Economy, 5th London Edition, vol. 2, pp. 407–408 and 463.)

J. R. McCulloch stated that a tax on insurance "discourages that prudence and foresight the encouragement of which ought to be an object with all prudent governments."

"Seeing the vast importance of insurance, it may well be doubted whether it ought to be charged with any duty, however slight." (A Statistical Account of the British Empire. Taxation of Insurance Companies, vol. 2, p. 511.)

Sir S. Morton Peto: "A tax on insurance is a tax not only upon industry but upon prudence and frugality, and the American system seems to be far worse than that of which we have so long been complaining in Great Britain." (Taxation, Its Levy and Expenditure, pp. 58, 73, 118, 121, 220. New York.)

New York Evening Post: "It is a fundamental principle of social science that the insurance contract itself ought to be free from taxation. Taxation ought to be on property, on production. Insurance companies produce nothing. If any tax is imposed on insurance companies or insured persons as such, it should be imposed on their property and not on their contracts. The taxation of premium receipts is utterly unscientific."

S. S. Huebner, University of Pennsylvania: "Encouragement and not repression should be the keynote of our tax system as applied to life insurance companies."

A. C. Pleydell, secretary of the New York Tax Reform Association: "These social and individual benefits are the result of prudence and thrift. Many States exempt savings bank deposits. If those who save primarily for themselves are to be encouraged by exemption from taxation, how absurd it is to discourage by taxation those who save for the benefit of others by insurance and protect society to that extent against pauperism." (The Injustice of Life Insurance Taxation, March, 1908.)

S. S. Huebner: "In striking contrast to the unscientific and heavy taxation of life insurance companies in America may be mentioned the fair treatment of the business by European countries. The treatment accorded to life insurance in these countries shows a proper understanding of the fundamental character of this form of insurance and reflects the progress which Europe is making in solving the whole complex problem of taxation." (National Tax Association, Columbus, Ohio.)

Lester W. Zartman, Ph. D.: "We conclude, then, that taxation of life insurance assets and premiums is wrong. If it is wrong, the taxes should not be levied. Life insurance is not a business which requires repressive measures in the way of penalties for its continuance."

TAXATION OF LIFE INSURANCE CONSISTENTLY AND UNIFORMLY OPPOSED BY STATESMEN AND OTHER PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

William Pitt: "Laying aside the proud idea of the vigor, permanence, and renewing energy which the measure secured, there is one case which, with view to the class who are really willing to save for the benefit of those for whom they are bound to provide, makes some modification. It is in favor of those who have recourse to that easy, certain, and advantageous mode of providing for their families by insuring their lives." (Debates on the first income-duty bill in the Commons, 1798.)

Charles Sumner: "The business of life insurance, as it seems to me, is peculiar. It differs from others in being not strictly, if I may say so, a money-making business. I know that persons get up insurance companies in order to advance their own interests, but the primary object of the insurance office is to protect other people, particularly the poor; it is to help the poor. I say, therefore, it is not primarily, as compared with many other businesses, a money-making business. On that account, as it seems to me, it has a title to certain consideration. Now, what is proposed? A tax on premiums. What are the premiums? The premiums are themselves a tax. The premiums constitute the tax which the person insured pays for his insurance.

"This is contrary to all sound policy. Here you are proposing to tax those who have taxed themselves that the Nation might not have to support them. You are pulling down the pillars of the temple. You are undermining the structure." (Congressional Globe, 37th Cong., 2d sess., pt. 3, p. 2335 et. seq.)

Ralph W. Breckenridge: "The most unmoral, uneconomic, unjust, and oppressive form of taxation is the tax levied upon gross premiums." (Argument before the national convention of insurance commissioners, 1907.)

"This is a tax on a tax, and can not be justified on any principle of morals or economics."

"It was never intended that the several States should annually filch from the policyholders of America $25,000,000, which, in the aggregate, the companies are compelled to pay under one form of exaction or another."

"Some States, overlooking the fact that this Nation is a Union of States and not a pack of wolves, have enacted laws under which that species of tax known as retaliatory is exacted."

"It is just as dishonest to steal under protection of a legislative enactment as without it. It is just as dishonest for a State to lay unholy hands on trust funds as for an individual to do it."

"It is a monstrous injustice for a State government to maintain itself by legislative raids upon trust funds, and the climax of cowardice to commit extortion in the name of the police power." (Committee on insurance law of the American Bar Association.)

"The State should insist upon the faithful conservation of life-insurance funds and their application to their intended use. It should be as reluctant itself to divert them from their intended use as to permit individuals to employ them for political purposes or in extravagance of management."

"All life insurance companies pay, in round numbers, in all the States $10,000,000 annually under these premium income-tax laws. If this sum were not paid into the State treasury, it would be used under the law and the policy contracts to reduce the premiums the policyholders are obligated to pay or employed to purchase paid-up additions to the policies. In the one case it would diminish the cost of insurance, in the other it would increase the amount insured. In both cases it would be used for the benefit of dependent people of the State." (National convention of insurance commissioners, 1907.)

Elizur Wright. "Life insurance deserves the fostering care of wise and liberal legislation. It should be freed from all unnecessary burdens. Government should as soon tax its asylums and hospitals as to seek a gain or revenue from the deposits which foresight and affection has set apart for the protection of thousands among the most helpless of its own citizens. A tax upon life insurance is nothing more than a tax upon widows and orphans." (Massachusetts Insurance Report for 1867.)

"Life insurance taxes either increase the cost of insurance or diminish the amount of it. In the one case they fall on the policyholders; in the other on the beneficiaries of the insured."

"The mere desire to raise revenue does not warrant imposing upon life insurance a special form of premium income tax." (National Convention of Insurance Commissioners, Detroit, Aug. 24, 1908.)

TAXATION OF LIFE INSURANCE CONSISTENTLY AND UNIFORMLY OPPOSED BY (C) THE EXAMPLE OF OTHER NATIONS.

No other Government in the world places an income tax upon life insurance companies.

England, besides not taxing the incomes of life insurance companies, specifically exempts from income taxation what a man pays for life insurance up to one-sixth of his income. (Sec. 54 of 16 and 17 Victoria, ch. 34.)

In 1906 and 1907 the amount of income allowed to be deducted on account of life insurance premiums amounted to £9,155,000. In the five years ending 1908 England returned £100,000 to the taxpayers on account of overpayment made in ignorance of this salutary provision of law.

Holland, besides not taxing life insurance, exempts up to $40, if paid for life insurance, from the personal income tax.

Germany, where taxes and fees of all kinds amount to less than one-eighth of what American companies are now paying to the States alone, contributes nearly $12,000,000 toward compulsory governmental insurance; about the same now being exacted from American companies by the various States.

TAXATION OF LIFE INSURANCE OPPOSED TO (D) THE PREVIOUS EXAMPLE OF OUR OWN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

The Federal Government has never taxed the incomes of life insurance companies previous to the Federal corporation tax bill passed during the last administration, except an emergency tax levied during the close of the Civil War, June 30, 1864, repealed in 1870. In the earlier years of the Civil War and during the Spanish War Congress properly exempted life insurance from taxation beyond the documentary stamp tax on new policies taken those years.

IV. AMERICAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES NOW PAY BURDENSOME TAXES TO EACH OF THE 48 DIFFERENT STATES.

The aggregate State taxation has become increasingly exacting, burdensome, and discouraging to life insurance policyholders and their beneficiaries; is already a crying evil, peculiar only to this country, without the additional imposition of Federal taxes.

William J. Graham: "Twenty-five million American men, women, and children, for the most part poor, and whose insurance averages for the whole less than $600 a policy, not only pay the cost of their own insurance and of State supervision and regulation, that should be much more economical than it is, but in addition contribute an uncontemplated profit to the States of over $8,000,000. If the companies continue their normal growth and tax rates remain unchanged, within the next 10 years the provident policyholders of the United States will be called upon to pay to Government authorities more than $100,000,000. In other words, the policyholders of the country can have their insurance within the next 10 years cost them less by $100,000,000 by achieving the removal of taxation from life insurance." (The World To-Day.)

The taxation of life insurance has increased from $0.70 on every $100 of premium income in 1860 to $1.23 in 1875, $1.42 in 1890, $2.15 in 1909, and $2.26 in 1911; from $2,249,148 in 1890 to $14,323,509 in 1911. Exclusive of taxes on real estate, in 1911 policyholders paid $12,017,595, or $1.90 per $100 of premiums.

V. FEDERAL GOVERNMENT LACKING AN EXCUSE OFFERED BY STATES.

The Government has not even the excuse of "cost of supervision" of life insurance companies as reason for taxation. Taxation by States was admittedly originated for the purpose of paying "cost of supervision." Owing to the wonderful American growth of life insurance, already it has become such a source of State revenue as to become an American disgrace in the view of foreign statesmen.

An English statesman has said that any British cabinet proposing such a tax on life insurance as is charged in America would not hold office 24 hours.

VI. PRESENT BILL INCONSISTENT WITH ITS PURPOSE.

(a) It imposes a direct tax upon 25,000,000 persons, the vast majority of whom have incomes of less than $4,000 and are under the express terms of the bill supposed to be exempt.

While no other civilized country in the world taxes the income of 25,000,000 policyholders, who are taxed $12,000,000 by 48 States, they were recently taxed in addition by the Federal Government. Now the present bill adds to this tax by taxing the nearly $90,000,000 in return premiums or refunds, annuity payments, cash surrender values, matured endowments, and in payments made to such living policyholders as bring their incomes to over $4,000. England and Holland not only do not tax the income of life insurance companies, but go further and expressly exempt certain portions of individual incomes if paid for life insurance. America not only makes no exemption but taxes on certain policies and persons life insurance funds repeatedly, as follows:

First. If the income is over $4,000, that part paid for life insurance is taxed instead of exempted.

Second. The income of the life insurance company is taxed.

Third. In almost every State in the Union the premium is taxed.

VII. SHOULD AMERICAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES BE PENALIZED?

Although life insurance did not originate in this country, Americans have voluntarily, not only without compulsion of Government, but against discouragement of Government, adopted this as their favorite method of providing against poverty and want for themselves and their children. In 1860 there were less than 50,000 policies in force. In 1880 there were less than 600,000. There are now nearly 35,000,000 policies, held by probably 25,000,000 persons. What Germany compels by law, what England has just adopted as governmental policy, Americans have voluntarily, in 56 years, assumed for their widows, orphans, homes, and old age to a greater extent twice over than all the rest of the world put together. Is it wise, in inaugurating a new fiscal policy, to handicap the measure by incorporating therein as subject to taxation things exempted by every other civilized Government? Is it wise to create 25,000,000 taxables in a bill intending to tax less than 500,000? Is it wise to force the 100,000 active life insurance agents, as well as the officers and directors, of the various companies to explain the increased cost of life insurance by the present fiscal policy of the present administration? Is it just to tax persons in bulk that the bill expressly purposes should not be taxed separately? Is it just to tax as income what is really capital? Is it just, under an income tax, to tax money three and four fold?

In half a century the Americans voluntarily availing themselves of this certain method of saving for self and family have grown to exceed in number all the depositors of banks of all kinds, plus all the owners of real estate, plus all the owners of stock in building and loan associations, plus all the owners of stock in all other corporations, plus all those engaged in active business for themselves. All these persons combined, including duplicates, fall far short of the 25,000,000 persons interested in life insurance.

Shall this administration handicap a measure which is a departure from former American fiscal policy by imposing a tax difficult to defend in principle and still more difficult to defend as applied to this bill, and which the trustees and other representatives of companies will be, as a matter of self-defense, obliged to explain to their 25,000,000 clients as contrary to morals, sound economics, and, until the previous administration, to all Federal precedent? Can anyone defend the selection of legal-reserve life insurance for such multiple taxation, when savings banks, building and loan associations, assessment and fraternal organizations, and even mutual fire insurance companies are expressly exempted?

Letter from H. N. Kelsey, manager of the Hamburg-Bremen Fire Insurance Co.:

NEW YORK, August 22, 1916.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are advised that the Senate committee has amended the Federal revenue bill, known as the income-tax measure, to provide for a 2 per cent income tax, with a further provision of 50 cents per thousand on the capital stock and surplus of companies (with a permissible deduction of $99,000), and it further prohibits any deduction on account of increase in reserves required by law; and it also continues indefinitely the stamp tax upon insurance policies. While the income and capital-stock features apply to all corporations, insurance companies are the only corporations required to continue the application of stamps, with the exception of stamps on conveyances, etc. The stamps formerly provided for from railroads, telegraphs, etc., have been discontinued.

This revenue stamp tax on fire insurance policies is equivalent to 1 per cent of our net income. The other two measures are an added burden to this heavy tax besides the tax already imposed by the various States. There is not a business in this country that has been taxed to such an excess, and it is an outrage upon the frugality of every policyholder, to say nothing of the tax in itself being far in excess of any profit derived from the business from the standpoint of the stockholders.

We therefore most earnestly protest to you, and ask if you will not lend your most careful and effective assistance to the defeat of this measure as a matter of fair play and justice to a class of business which is the backbone of the credit of the country, and at the same time a business which has been continuously for the past 10 years performing its mission of an actual loss, amounting for the years 1906 to 1915, inclusive, to 1.04 per cent. The percentage of taxes, exclusive of real estate, to actual net income, by years, as compiled by the National Board of Fire Underwriters, is as follows:

	Percentage of taxes.
1910	33.53
1911	57.07
1912	52.54
1913	57.90
1914	Loss.
1915	50.33

Trusting that you will see that we get a square deal in the matter, and with assurances of our high regard, believe us to be,

Yours, respectfully,

H. N. KELSEY, Manager.

Third. The number of employees appointed since July 1, 1913, from eligible lists upon certification by the United States Civil Service Commission.

sion, and who subsequently were covered into the civil service under an Executive order dated May 18, 1916, being Executive Order No. 2383.

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State containing the information requested.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 24, 1916.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, in response to the resolution adopted by the Senate on August 16, 1916, reading as follows—

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate as follows:

"First. The number of employees who have been appointed to positions in the State Department since July 1, 1913.

"Second. What increase in the force of employees in the State Department has been made since July 1, 1913.

"Third. The number of employees appointed since July 1, 1913, from eligible lists upon certification by the United States Civil Service Commission.

"Fourth. The number of employees appointed temporarily without any civil-service examination or certification by the Civil Service Commission, and who subsequently were covered into the civil service under an Executive order dated May 18, 1916, being Executive Order No. 2383," has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate, if his judgment approves thereof, the following report:

First. From July 1, 1913, to June 30, 1916, 76 employees were appointed to statutory position in the Department of State to fill vacancies occasioned by death, resignations, or transfers within the service. Of these 76 employees 50 were appointed through certifications of the Civil Service Commission or by transfers from other executive departments with the approval of the Civil Service Commission, 2 by reinstatement under civil-service rules, and 4 upon individual Executive orders. The 20 remaining appointments covering this period were to positions without the civil service, 7 of them to confidential positions provided by law, 4 by promotions within the department, and 11 upon selections by the Secretary of State.

From August 1, 1914, to July 1, 1916, 158 temporary employees were appointed in connection with vastly increased departmental duties arising from European war conditions—the relief and protection of American citizens abroad, etc. The terms of service of these temporary clerks varied from a few weeks each to as much as 22 months each, depending upon the exigencies of the current work and the efficiency shown in the performance of their duties. Because of the urgency of the situation and the pressing emergency confronting the department it was necessary to secure these needed temporary clerks in the shortest possible time and not to await the usual and necessary delays incident to calls upon and certifications from the eligible temporary lists of the Civil Service Commission. Most of them were therefore secured through Washington business colleges and the registry lists of various typewriter firms in the city. It was found that by this method competent people could be secured with the minimum of delay.

Second. From July 1, 1913, to June 30, 1916, there was no increase in the permanent clerical force of the department. For the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1916, an increase of 94 permanent employees was provided in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The necessity of this additional force is fully set forth on page 1229 of House Document No. 27, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session (Book of Estimates).

Third. Since July 1, 1913, 50 employees of the department were appointed from eligible lists upon certification of the United States Civil Service Commission, or by transfers from other departments, or reinstatement, under civil-service rules and regulations.

Fourth. On July 1, 1916, 80 employees were transferred from the temporary to the statutory rolls of the department in accordance with the Executive order of May 18, 1916 (No. 2383), which provided as a requisite for such transfer a continuous service in the Department of State of at least six months prior to July 1, 1916, or the passage of an appropriate civil-service examination. The Executive order provided further that the temporary employees should have satisfactorily performed their respective duties and should have attained a competent rating by the department board of efficiency. It is understood that a considerable number of those eligible to appointment under the six-months clause of the order were also eligible as having passed an appropriate civil-service examination.

The above order was issued upon the request of the Secretary of State, who set forth the reasons therefor in the following letter to the President, dated May 17, 1916:

"MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, approved on the 10th instant, provides for 70 additional permanent clerkships and 14 additional permanent nonclerical positions in the Department of State, all of which in the ordinary course of procedure would be filled through certifications of the Civil Service Commission.

"Since the outbreak of the European war in August, 1914, the department has employed a number of temporary clerks who have been paid from special appropriations authorized by Congress. The new legislative bill makes no provision for the retention of these clerks beyond July 1 next, and specifically provides that after that date no funds appropriated by any other act shall be used for temporary employees in the Department of State. A large percentage of those now temporarily employed have been in the department from 6 to 18 months and during that time have acquired such experience and familiarity with the work as to make their retention more desirable than to replace them with new and inexperienced people. In addition, during the many extraordinary demands upon the department they have willingly and uncomplainingly labored long beyond the usual hours of Government employment and have well earned the reward of permanent appointment in the service. Furthermore, to drop out at this trying time those employees who have been doing such excellent and efficient work and fill their places with others lacking in experience and requiring a course of special training would mean almost demoralisation throughout the department.

"In the circumstances it would seem proper, and in the best interest of the public service, to permit by Executive order, appointments to the lower permanent grades provided in the new appropriation bill, from those temporary employees who have served at least six months, who have performed satisfactory service, who have been given a competent rating by the efficiency board of the department, or who may have already successfully passed an appropriate examination by the Civil Service Commission.

"The persons comprising our temporary force, with but few exceptions, have shown commendable interest and zeal in their work. The department has gradually dispensed with the services of those who have not maintained a desirable standard of efficiency, so that those remaining comprise a force of competent employees which, in view of actual experience gained, can not be dispensed with without serious detriment to the urgent and important work of the department.

"I inclose herewith the draft of an Executive order which will accomplish the object above set forth. The requirement for six months' service coincides with the probationary period under which civil-service appointments are made, the desire being to formulate an order complying with the spirit of the civil-service regulations. It would be unfortunate to disarrange the present organization of the department by disposing of one-third of its trained clerical force and substituting for it a number of new, uncertain, and inexperienced employees.

"I have given this matter my serious personal consideration, and with the interest of the department solely in mind, earnestly recommend the approval of the accompanying order.

"I am, my dear Mr. President,

"Faithfully, yours, ROBERT LANSING."

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

TAX ON INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I present a number of telegrams received from citizens of my State relative to the provision in the revenue bill relating to the continuance of the stamp tax upon fire insurance policies. I ask that the telegrams may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JACKSON, MISS., August 21, 1916.

Senator JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Am informed that amended Federal revenue bill provides for indefinite continuance of stamp tax upon fire insurance policies, while railroad, telegraph, and others have been exempted. This looks like unfair discrimination, and will appreciate it if you can consistently oppose retention of stamp tax on insurance policies.

J. H. WELLS.

JACKSON, MISS., August 21, 1916.

Senator JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

We note new revenue bill provides for retention of stamp tax on fire insurance policies, while freight bills and express receipts are exempted. This looks like unfair discrimination, as the consumer pays the freight in both instances. Your many insurance friends and policyholders will appreciate it if you can consistently oppose retention of stamp tax on insurance policies.

VARDAMAN & VARDAMAN.

MERIDIAN, MISS., August 21, 1916.

JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We think action of Senate committee in retaining stamp tax against insurance companies is unjust and discriminatory. We hope insurance companies shall bear no greater burdens than other corporations.

L. D. CALDWELL.

JACKSON, MISS., August 21, 1916.

Hon. JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In the matter of Federal revenue bill I earnestly protest against the prohibition of deduction of increase in reserve as basis for income tax, as applied to fire insurance companies; also protest against tax of 50 cents per thousand on capital stock and surplus, and I am strongly opposed to the continuance indefinitely of stamp tax on insurance policies, and ask your aid on these points.

I. B. BEARD.

VICKSBURG, MISS., August 21, 1916.

Hon. JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Revenue bill now before Congress provides a stamp tax on all fire insurance policies, to continue indefinitely; other corporations such as railroad, telegraph, and telephone companies exempted; this I think an injustice to fire insurance company, and ask you use your good influences in placing the fire insurance companies on same basis as other corporations by exempting them also from this tax.

ALBERT A. WEILLE.

GREENWOOD, MISS, August 21, 1916.

Senator J. K. VARDAMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

We hope you will protest against the continuance of revenue stamp on insurance policies.

Hon. JAMES K. VARDAMAN,

We will appreciate your efforts toward having fire insurance companies exempted from the continuation of the stamp tax on fire policies, which is included in the amended revenue bill. Railroad telegraph companies and others have been exempted from this tax, and we feel that this is unfair discrimination.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of San Fernando, Cal., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14824) to prevent fraud at public auctions in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 819) thereon.

Mr. WEEKS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7045) for the relief of Caleb T. Holland, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3180) to authorize the appointment of Clarence C. Kress to the grade of captain, United States Army Medical Corps, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 818) thereon.

MAHONING RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 17501) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Youngstown, Ohio, to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio, and I submit a report (No. 817) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], who is very much interested in the bill, to the report.

Mr. HARDING. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we had better continue with the consideration of the unfinished business, and I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire objects, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: Mr. President, a moment ago I objected to the consideration of a bill which the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] reported from the Committee on Commerce. I now withdraw the objection, and I hope the bill will be considered.

Mr. HARDING. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LEE of Maryland:

A bill (S. 6932) for the relief of John P. Hanlon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 6933) removing the disabilities of Richard W. Hocker; and

A bill (S. 6934) removing the disabilities of Thomas B. Cassel; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that Senate joint resolution 117, authorizing the President to call for volunteers for Mexico, introduced by me and now on the table calendar, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. SHIELDS. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the revenue bill (H. R. 16763), which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will allow the amendment to be printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to have the amendment read. It is very short.

The amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table and be printed, as follows:

On page 58, line 7, insert the following:

"Provided, That where any tax heretofore due and payable has been duly paid by the taxpayer it shall not be re-collected from any person or corporation required to retain it at its source, nor shall any penalty be imposed or collected in such cases from the taxpayer, or such person or corporation whose duty it was to retain it, for failure to return or pay the same, unless such failure was fraudulent and for the purpose of evading payment."

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. POMERENE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, after the Senate shall have voted on the pending revenue bill, it proceed to the consideration of House bill 15842, and to the disposition of that measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the measure?

Mr. OWEN. It is the corrupt-practices act.

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody in the Senate can tell when the revenue bill is going to pass; that has not been decided. It seems to me that it is unwise for the Senator now to ask unanimous consent to take up the bill to which he has referred after the revenue bill shall have passed. We do not know when a resolution will be agreed to providing for final adjournment. We are right in the last days of the session of Congress, and for that reason Mr. President, I shall object.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on the first day of this session the chairman of the Democratic conference, Senator KERN, introduced a bill providing for the control of corrupt practices in this country. The bill is similar to one which was reported during the last Congress, but was not acted on by the Senate. The House passed a similar measure at this session and sent it to the Senate. It has been reported back to the Senate and is now on the calendar. The bill is not a long bill; it is not an involved bill. It ought to be capable of disposition in one or two days. The House of Representatives acted in a few hours in considering and acting on the measure.

After the revenue bill shall have been acted on by the Senate that bill must go to conference, and it certainly will take several days to reconcile the differences between the two Houses, and in that time this bill can be considered, amended if necessary, and disposed of.

There is no reason why Senators should not in the meantime read this bill; should not study this bill; should not be completely prepared to express themselves upon it, unless it is the desire of Senators to prevent action just before the pending election. The American people, I believe, will not approve of the old system of the use of money on a gigantic scale to influence and control the elections of this country. As one of their Representatives, keenly sensible of my duty toward them, under my oath as a public servant, I shall resolutely insist upon action now. I earnestly hope I may have the sympathy and cooperation of all Senators, whether Democratic or Republican, in getting immediate constructive action and that I may not be impeded by the old Senate game of a substantial filibuster under the pretense of debate, but that the debate shall be simple and straightforward, and amendments suggested sincere and of constructive and not of obstructive purpose.

This bill is easily understood. The first section simply defines what "political committees" are, what the word "candidates" and the word "elections" shall be construed to mean, what the words "political purposes," the words "disbursement," "person," and "Representative" shall be construed to mean, in order that the text of the bill shall not be susceptible of misconstruction.

Section 2 of the bill provides for the organization of political committees of citizens who desire to take part in influencing elections, and provides a method by which such committees can be organized.

Section 3 requires each of the committees to have a chairman and a treasurer.

Section 4 provides that every political committee must keep a bank account and keep a complete record of receipts and disbursements.

Section 5 requires receipts to be preserved.

Section 6 provides for an account to the treasurer and a record of contributions.

Section 7 requires statements by the treasurer to be filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Section 8 requires the details of the contributions, where they are above $100 and where they are below $100, and the aggregate of contributions and disbursements in like fashion.

Section 9 requires statements by others than political committees of expenditures where they exceed $50, and compels a private person who contributes more than $50 to make a report as if he were a committee, and provides further that no individual citizen shall contribute to any election a sum exceeding $5,000.

Section 10 puts a limitation on expenditures of $400,000 on national committees in the election of presidential and vice presidential electors, and makes the chairman and treasurer of each national political committee responsible for preventing the aggregate of such disbursements exceeding this amount.

It provides further that the chairman and treasurer of the congressional campaign committees shall be charged with the responsibility of accounting to the treasurers of their respective national committees for disbursements made by them. It limits the aggregate of disbursements for a presidential candidate to $50,000, for a vice presidential candidate to $25,000, and provides that no political committee or any member or officer thereof and no personal campaign committee shall make any disbursements for the nomination of such candidates except under the direction and with the consent of such candidates. It makes the amount which a Senator may expend for a nomination or for an election $5,000, but provides for certain exemptions in the way of postage, circulars, etc., on condition that those expenditures shall be reported, together with other expenditures. It provides that the aggregate of disbursements by a Member of Congress for his nomination or election shall not exceed the sum of $2,500. It provides that candidates shall, within certain times, make these reports to the Secretary of the Senate, if a candidate for the Senate, or to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if a candidate for the House. It provides that no candidate for Representative or Senator shall make a promise of patronage in order to secure his election or nomination. It requires the statements to contain a statement that no promise has been made. It requires the statements to be made under oath. It provides that the bill shall not be construed to annul or vitiate the laws of any State not directly in conflict with the bill, and provides that no disbursement may be lawfully made except for the following purposes—and this is a very important part of the bill, which ought to meet the approval of every Senator on both sides of this Chamber:

First. For the traveling expenses and expenses of subsistence of the candidate and of the members of political committees and their bona fide officers and assistants.

Second. The payment of fees or charges for placing the name of the candidate upon the primary ballot.

Third. The hire of clerks and stenographers and the cost of clerical and stenographic work and of addressing, preparing, and mailing campaign literature.

Fourth. Telegraph and telephone calls, postage, freight, and express charges.

Fifth. Printing and stationery.

Sixth. Procuring and formulating lists of voters.

Seventh. Headquarters or office rent.

Eighth. Newspaper and other advertising.

Ninth. Renting of halls or providing places for public meetings, and all expenses of advertising and other expenses usually incident to holding such meetings.

Mr. President, these affirmative declarations are intended to exclude the use of money in buying voters, in bribing men under the pretense of using their services for legitimate purposes when in point of fact the man is really hired to vote, and a multitude of crafty means of evasion.

The bill provides further that any person who, otherwise than in compliance with the provisions of the bill, shall hire or employ, or offer to hire or employ, or shall reward or give to any person anything of value for his services, or for loss of time, or for reimbursement of his expenses in consideration of such person directly or indirectly working, electioneering, or making public addresses for or against any candidates or candidate, or who rewards or offers to reward any person for his vote or influence, or the promise of his vote or influence, for or against any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, or Senator of the United States, or Member of the House of Representatives, shall be deemed guilty of a felony—not a misdemeanor, Mr. President, because the basest crime of all crimes is to befoul the ballot box of this country and to steal the governing powers of the people of the United States by fraudulent practices in the ballot box—and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years.

Section 11 of the bill provides that the statements required by the bill shall include the name and post-office address of the opponents of the candidate making a report, with instructions that the Clerk of the House of Representatives or the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, shall require such opponents, even if not successful, to make a proper report of their expenditures under penalties for failure to do so.

Section 12 requires that the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate shall, on or before the 15th day of January next after any general or special election for Representative in Congress or Senator of the United States, report to the House and Senate, respectively, the names of these candidates and their reports, and that these reports shall be printed as a public document, in order that the people of this country may see to what extent and how far money is being used in the control of the election of the President of the United States and of Members of this body and of the House of Representatives.

Section 13 provides that jurisdiction over all violations of the act is conferred upon the United States district court.

Section 14 provides that personal expenses for stationery, traveling expenses, circulars, advertising, postage, and telegraph and telephone service shall not be subject to the provisions of the bill, except that an account shall be kept of all moneys expended for circulars and postage and advertising authorized by the section, which shall be reported in the statements required by the bill as an addendum thereto, but not subject to the limitations in amount fixed by section 10 of the bill.

This provision is a matter of grave doubt as to the exception; but, nevertheless, it will permit the people of the United States to pass their judgment on whether or not the abuse will justify striking out this exception. We have proceeded very slowly in this matter. This question has been up for years.

We have taken one poor, little, weak, inadequate step from time after time, and we now have on the statute books a law that is fundamentally and essentially as contemptible as any law that was ever written upon the statute books of any intelligent people. I say so because the present so-called corrupt-practices act deals only with committees handling two or more States and exercises no control whatever over committees inside of a State and no control whatever over individuals inside of a State, and as far as the present law is concerned, an individual, as a private person, could go into the different States and spend a million dollars or ten million dollars corruptly without the laws of the United States holding him to an account for the stealing of the presidential office or the stealing of the senatorships upon this floor.

The idea of the Senate of the United States refusing now to act upon this matter, right in the face of a pending election and of this acknowledged state of the law, I do not believe will meet with the approval of the people of the United States, and I do not think it ought to meet with the approval of the people of the United States, whose sworn representatives we are.

It shall be no fault of mine if the Senate does not act at this session on this bill on the calendar. The newspapers have announced—and announced without any justification, in my opinion—that there was an implied agreement between the Senators on this side of the aisle and Senators on the other side of the aisle that they were not going to permit this matter to be heard. Mr. President, they are going to permit it to be heard. It is going to be heard. No such pretended agreement exists. I do not know who is responsible for the false report, but it assuredly is not a friend of the bill.

There was an impression that the parliamentary status of this bill was such that even if the Senate acted it could not be disposed of by the House. That is not true.

The House bill has passed and we have reported it, and the matter can be disposed of in conference within 24 hours. No parliamentary difficulty is in the way except a possible Republican filibuster, if they dare face the country with it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Is the Senator's anxiety to pass this bill chiefly to remedy conditions in Oklahoma? I ask because I have heard that the greatest laxity prevails there, to put it mildly, in the methods of conducting elections and the expenditure of money.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that I should be glad to have it apply to Oklahoma; but I will also say to the Senator that there is no State in the Union that will require it more than the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course, there is a difference of opinion on that.

Mr. OWEN. Hardly.

Mr. PENROSE. But I think investigation will disclose the fact that the most corrupt elections in the country are in the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. If that were true as to Oklahoma—which it is not—as it assuredly is as to Pennsylvania, Mr. President, then this act will put an end to it. I will say to the Senator that there is some basis for his inaccurate observations, because when I was a candidate I was informed, and I verily believe, that the Lumber Trust sent $40,000 into my State to defeat my nomination, being offended because of the demand which I made and voiced on this floor that Mr. Lorimer should not retain his seat in the Senate, because the Lumber Trust had bribed the Illinois legislators to elect Mr. Lorimer, at a cost estimated at between $100,000 and $200,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon an interruption, I should like to emphasize the fact that this bill is not intended for any particular State but for all the States.

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And if there are irregularities in Oklahoma or Mississippi or Pennsylvania, they ought to be corrected in so far as legislation can correct them. I agree with the Senator that the bill ought to be considered at this time.

Mr. OWEN. I have no doubt that there is more or less irregularity in all of the States. I do not claim any extraordinary virtue for Oklahoma. Those people are only human beings, subject to the same temptations as people elsewhere, but public sentiment there is absolutely overwhelmingly in favor of honesty in our elections. I represent the people of my State truly when I demand this statute.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I simply want to say that it seems surprising to one coming from this part of the country that in a large State like Oklahoma $40,000 seems to shock the public conscience so greatly. There is one case which I know could be disclosed by the records of the Senate in which over $50,000 was contributed for the purpose of influencing an election in my State on the Saturday before the election which was held on the following Tuesday. I thoroughly agree with what the Senator from Oklahoma says about the necessity of passing this bill.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, to avoid any ambiguity as to the application of the last statement, I should be glad to know from the Senator from Delaware whether the $50,000 to which he refers was used for the election of the candidate of the Republican Party.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Most assuredly it was, as many Senators now sitting in this body know.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, there was a million dollars spent to elect President Wilson—over a million.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is it not a fact that two and a half million dollars were used in 1896 to elect Mr. McKinley?

Mr. PENROSE. That might have been.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The rate has been going down since that time.

Mr. OWEN. If what the Senator [Mr. PENROSE] says is true—and I do not know whether it is true or not—I want to put a stop to the practice. I do know that no such sum was officially reported as spent in the election of Mr. Wilson, but it was currently reported in 1896 that Mark Hanna raised $16,000,000 to elect McKinley and the "Big Boys" successfully threatened a panic besides and voted every poor employee the corporations could coerce to elect McKinley; and I do not want these great parties rivaling each other in raising gigantic funds in a contest of money for the purpose of dishonestly and corruptly influencing votes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator noticed that the treasurer of the Republican National Committee is asking $10 contributions to enable him to get a fund for the coming campaign?

Mr. OWEN. I wish it might be confined to $10 contributions. I would be much more content if both parties were confined to small contributions.

The suggestion of the Senator that innocently assumes the Republicans will rely on small contributions will not be taken seriously by the people, much less by Republican leaders who know better. They will raise millions in big contributions if not prevented, and every well informed man believes it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Democratic committee in 1912 solicited $1 contributions, which was quite reasonable.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not seen their certificate yet. I have seen the advertisement of the Republican treasurer.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have in my hand now a memorandum showing conditions in Ohio, and, according to the report filed with the secretary of state under the Ohio law, Mr. Herrick, who was the successful candidate for the Republican nomination at the recent primaries held in that State, spent the following amounts:

By Herrick personally, $22,175.

By the Herrick Voters' League, $29,000.

By the Stark County Herrick Voters' League, $413—a total of $49,588.

And the reports from nearly a hundred other counties have not apparently come in yet. I do not know how much it will be, but I say this is an abuse that ought to stop.

I do not think the Republican Senators on that side of the line should filibuster against this bill. I do not think they should refuse their consent that a vote may be taken upon it. I do not see how they reconcile themselves in refusing to permit a vote on this bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator expect the Republicans in this Chamber or any individual Senator to take this bill exactly as he has framed it, without consideration?

Mr. OWEN. Not at all.

Mr. PENROSE. It will take some time to form a good corrupt-practices act.

Mr. OWEN. The threat of taking some time is an old, old story and an old, old joke. It means a filibuster threatened under words the people would not understand in reading the RECORD, but which every Senator knows means filibuster under pretense of debate.

Mr. PENROSE. It will be applicable to this bill also.

Mr. OWEN. But a filibuster will be well understood by the people when it presents itself, even if under the false color of debate.

Mr. PENROSE. No one is filibustering.

Mr. OWEN. And it will not be done without being exposed, I can tell the Senator.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. STONE. My friend from Oklahoma said he could not understand why our friends on the Republican side of the Chamber could object to the passage of this bill. He certainly did not mean in that statement to have any doubt as to the reason. The reason is that they expect to try to buy this election.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I have heard it stated from several sources that the Democratic Party is proposing to buy it——

Mr. STONE. We are ready to vote to-morrow to pass this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. That they have already raised a very large sum for that purpose which they have distributed in part.

Mr. OWEN. The Democrats are ready to act now, and I challenge the Senators on the other side to action.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, the supposition throughout the country is that an enormous corruption fund has been collected by the Democratic Party, and now they want to lock the door.

Mr. OWEN. I have heard that statement made with regard to the Republican Party. I do not know whether it is true or not, but I believe the Senator himself would certainly know if it were true that the Republicans had gathered and distributed a gigantic fund for such purpose.

Mr. PENROSE. No; I have been down here attending to my official duties. I do not know what is going on.

Mr. OWEN. This bill will disclose the fact if such funds have been collected and will prevent the corrupt use of such funds in either party if they have been collected.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to suggest that the statements which have been made by Senators on either side of the aisle have proven beyond any sort of question the necessity for this legislation. After the admissions made and the suspicions expressed I do not see how any Senator can afford to antagonize the passage of this bill at this session. To do so would be almost criminal inconsistency.

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If that money has been collected, the enactment of this law will disclose the fact, and it may be the means by which a few distinguished gentlemen can be sent to the penitentiary for using it, a thing that might contribute materially toward the purification of the political atmosphere in this country about election time.

Mr. OWEN. They will not use it if this act is passed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to suggest that even if such a fund has been collected, this legislation can be so framed that it can not be used.

Mr. OWEN. It would not be used in any event until just before the election; but if this bill is passed it can not be used in any improper way without great jeopardy to the political thieves guilty of corruption. I do not believe that the people of the United States are going to stand any more buying of elections in this country.

Mr. President, the parliamentary way is clear. This bill is on the calendar. The House of Representatives has acted. A conference can dispose of the matter within a day after the Senate shall consider it and, if it requires amendment, after it shall be properly amended. But to say that it will take a good deal of time, with the sinister suggestion that it will be debated to death, will not go in this Chamber any more without prompt exposure. If filibustering is really privately and secretly proposed by the Republicans against this bill, they are going to be compelled to publicly filibuster against it.

I notify the Senate that in due time I shall move the Senate to act upon it and it will be then for the Republicans to conduct an open filibuster if they see fit. They can not do it under cover. I know at least six good Republicans who will vote to take this bill up.

I say to the Senator that as far as I am concerned I am willing to stay here as long as is necessary to demonstrate either the passage of this bill or to determine to the satisfaction of the people of the United States the sinister opposition that will prevent it from being voted upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has not been very constant in attendance here and his colleague has disappeared from view.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Oklahoma, now addressing the Senate, has been here sufficiently to fully discharge every duty incumbent on him, and at this session has been as continuously present as the Senator, except for a visit to Oklahoma of two days on an urgent business trip.

The Senator from Oklahoma has, through his committee, delivered the rural-credits bill, taken active part in having the child-labor bill he introduced passed, obtained a favorable report on cloture in the Senate, and is now presenting the corrupt-practices act, not to mention very many other acts he has personally prepared and had passed.

The presence of the Senator from Oklahoma and his urgent demand for a corrupt-practices act at all events will demonstrate that he is present now.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say to my colleagues that on the 15th day of July this corrupt-practices act was made a part of the legislative program of the Democrats for this session. I carefully examined the records of the Democratic conference in the hands of the secretary of that conference, Senator PITTMAN. I read with painstaking care every single resolution passed from that time to this. There has been no change either directly or indirectly of that action of the conference.

It is true that in an attempt to reconcile the Republicans to vote upon the legislative program which we had, they insisted upon naming certain particular bills and leaving off of the list the corrupt practices act. It is also true that on this side a poll was taken and a number were found who, because of the long time the session was taking and because of the anxiety to get home and appear in their States, where they had campaigns pending, yielded to the suggestion; but the matter was not accepted then by the Republican side, and no obligation whatever rests on those who tentatively and conditionally consented to such proposed program, as the conditions utterly failed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator for yielding, because I want to say to the Senator that he has made a misstatement.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be glad to correct any statement I have made, if it be inaccurate.

Mr. GALLINGER. The majority submitted a list of measures which they desired to have passed at this session, and the corrupt-practices act was not on that list; so that the Senator must not say that the minority is responsible for keeping it off the list submitted by the majority.

Mr. OWEN. I am very glad to hear that disclaimer. I was certainly under the impression that the minority were responsible for keeping it off, but since the minority disclaims the paternity of this illegitimate child I know that no Democrat will consent to be known as its father.

Mr. PENROSE. And, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me one brief observation——

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. So far as I am concerned personally, I will go as far as the Senator from Oklahoma or any other Senator to pass a corrupt-practices law. I would even go to the extent of arbitrarily prohibiting the use of money in any election, completely stopping it; and I am willing to stay here all the rest of the summer and until the day before election, if the Senator wants to stay here with me and a sufficient number of other Senators will remain to make a quorum, to consider this bill, the immigration bill, and everything else on the calendar; but, in view of the fact that Senators want to go home and that we have been here a long while, anyhow, it seems reasonable that a bill like this, that requires the most careful thought, should have full opportunity to be considered. I will help the Senator get it up next winter, and help him pass some kind of a bill.

Mr. OWEN. The willingness of the Senator to stay here until the day before the election, possibly until the day after the election, considering the corrupt-practices act is really pathetic.

Mr. PENROSE. I take it, from all I have heard, that the Senator did not have this interest in election reforms during his own candidacy for reelection to the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Well, the Senator might hear more and know less. I should not like to say what I have heard about some of the States and some of the things that have gone on in some of the States, very near the Senator from Pennsylvania, for fear that it would not be parliamentary. What I want to do is to stop the suspicions that are going around, even if they are not well founded, and to stop the corrupt practice that has dishonored our country.

This bill provides that—

> No corporation or officer thereof on behalf of such corporation or from corporate property shall make any contributions whatever for political purposes. No funds shall be transmitted from one State into another for political purposes in excess of $1,000 for each congressional district.

That will keep some of the money out of Oklahoma that might otherwise go there, and it will keep money out of Wisconsin, where, I am informed, on one occasion $250,000 was sent by the chairman of the Republican national committee to defeat LA FOLLETTE for the Senate.

For that reason, among others, Senator LA FOLLETTE and his Republican friends, like Senators KENYON, CLAPP, NORRIS, and others, are for an adequate corrupt-practices act, as is every true Progressive, I suppose. Since the Republicans have pledged their loyalty to Progressive principles (and Progressive votes), let them show the integrity of their high and virtuous purposes now by voting for this bill, by helping constructively (and not destructively) to perfect this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did the Senator observe how much money had been contributed to elect him [Senator LA FOLLETTE] on a certain occasion?

Mr. OWEN. I do not know that I have, but it would take some money to meet that kind of a fund against him. I want to stop the war of these funds. I do not believe that these large funds ought to be used either for or against a Senator. I think he ought to be allowed to go to his constituency with a clean case and contend for his cause on its merits, and not have it unduly influenced by money one way or the other.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator has not read it, I will say that former Senator Stephenson, in his memoirs, states that he spent about half a million dollars in Wisconsin in connection with the then regular organization there.

Mr. OWEN. Well, I have seen that statement also very vigorously denied by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and I believe Senator LA FOLLETTE against his corrupt enemies.

Section 15 of the bill provides:

> That every candidate and political committee shall securely keep and preserve, for a period of two years from the date of any primary or election at which such candidate was voted for or in which such political committee participated, all records, accounts, ledgers, cash books, canceled checks, check stubs, and other written or documentary evidence and the records of all receipts and expenditures made by him or it or on his or its behalf, and these records shall be, and are hereby, declared to be public records.

Not private records, but public records. They belong to the public; they vitally concern the public. This is not a private matter. A railroad president a few days ago had the unparalleled impudence to tell an officer of the United States—Mr. Folk—that the contributions of the railroads for political purposes were private matters; and yet those roads come here and claim to represent twelve thousand millions of dollars of property, and if they can use money ad libitum as a private matter the liberties of common citizens working at from $2 to $20 a day are gone to destruction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator in all seriousness if the law that is now on the statute books does not prohibit corporations from contributing to political campaigns, and does it not cover substantially the same ground as his bill in that respect?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the narrow limitation of the question of the Senator would carry an implication that is thoroughly untrue. It is true that corporations as corporations are forbidden from making such contributions; but this bill goes much further. It prevents the funds belonging to corporations being used, directly or indirectly; it prevents the hiring of employees for corrupt purposes. It goes much further, and prevents private individuals from being guilty of corrupt practices. Under the present law, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, the so-called publicity of the present statute relates only to committees operating in two or more States. It allows any committee to go on the inside of a State and allows any individual to go on the inside of a State and resort to any corrupt practice he pleases, without the Federal law laying a hand upon him. The law on the statute books is a fraud; it is—I was about to use unparliamentary language—it is an unspeakable fraud on the American people. It seems to promise them protection against corrupt practices, when, in fact, it does not protect them in the slightest degree. The so-called reports of campaign expenditures which are now sent to the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives are ridiculous. They do not include all the money expended on Federal elections, and the law does not require it. I know this law is a dastardly fraud, and every Senator here must know the same thing. How long, O Lord; how long!

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. With the permission of the Senator, I will suggest that this bill is intended to strengthen the present law, to carry out the purpose of the American people in the enactment of that law. It does not impair the efficiency of the present law at all; but it is rather to strengthen it, to help to carry out, to execute, and make more effective the law already upon the statute books prohibiting corporations from contributing to campaign funds. If Senators desire purity in politics; if they really are in favor of preventing the corrupt use of money in elections, knowing, as they do, the utter inefficiency of the present law, it seems to me that they should embrace with enthusiasm the opportunity to perfect the bill proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and pass it at once.

Mr. OWEN. I am praying you now, Senators, to make effective what the people of the United States thought they were getting when they got that old law. The old law they got was nothing but a cloak, behind which thieves could perpetrate the most dangerous, the most vicious of all crimes—stealing the governing powers of the people of the United States; stealing the presidential office; stealing the Senate; stealing the House of Representatives; stealing the power of taxation; and stealing the power to deny the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to the citizens of this country.

Mr. President, I feel very strongly about this matter. I caused the corrupt-practices bill to be introduced on the first day of this session. It was duly reported. The House acted on a bill introduced in that body, and now the improved bill introduced in the Senate comes before the Senate in lieu of the House bill, or as a substitute for the House bill. The parliamentary status is clear. There is nothing now to prevent action on the part of the Senate except a fundamental unwillingness on the part of some of our distinguished opponents on the other side of the aisle, who, under the color of debate, may, if they please, carry on a filibuster until the election.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Was objection made when the Senator asked unanimous consent?

Mr. OWEN. Every time when I have asked unanimous consent to vote on this bill at a fixed time Republican objection has been made. Last Saturday I asked unanimous consent, and to-day I asked unanimous consent.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Was objection made to-day?

Mr. OWEN. It was made to-day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Who made the objection?

Mr. OWEN. It was made by the leader of the Republican side, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is the chosen leader of that side and who vigilantly acts for the Republicans on all occasions.

One of the most important sections of this bill is section 16, which provides that no person not a candidate, and no organization, association, partnership, or committee not a political candidate under the terms of the bill shall contribute, pay, or expend, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value for the purpose of influencing the elections except as a contribution to a candidate or to a political committee authorized by law to act.

I do not care to dig up the past. I understand perfectly well that the American people move slowly, move gradually as experience justifies, and they improve their system of government step by step, as knowledge justifies. All that I want to do is put a stop to the buying of elections in this country by private citizens who are multimillionaires, and who can spend millions of dollars without feeling it and then recoup themselves through the taxing power of the people by practices generally known as those of the "invisible government."

Mr. STONE. And expect to get it back.

Mr. OWEN. They would have defeated me in my State if money could have done it, and but for the honesty of the people of Oklahoma I would not now be here or making this appeal.

The bill further provides that no person shall contribute or pay to any candidate or political committee any money, funds, credits, or anything of value that belongs to or is under the control of any other person.

That is another loophole that is stopped up by this bill, because in dealing with thieves you must have a bill that is closely knit together. This bill has been carefully gone over by the Department of Justice and by the friends of justice, and we believe that it will hold water.

It provides also that legal expenses in election contests shall not be limited or affected by the bill.

It provides for punishment by imprisonment of those who violate it; and section 20 gives an immunity bath to persons who are testifying on behalf of the Government.

If a man is used as an instrumentality for buying up votes, he can be summoned and compelled to testify under this bill, being given an immunity bath under the bill. He can not throw himself behind the shield of the constitutional provision that no citizen shall be required to testify where his testimony will incriminate himself, by means of which skillful lawyers now prevent corrupt and corrupting witnesses from giving testimony, because this bill proposes to give an immunity bath. The man does not put himself in jeopardy, and he can be compelled under this bill to tell the truth, and it is the truth that the American people want. It is honesty in elections. It is that the jury passing upon the great issues of statecraft between the two great parties shall not be, by sinister means, misled, suborned, bribed, or coerced, and that no member of our great electorate shall be subjected to such temptation because of poverty or because of dependence for employment upon those who have the power of life and death over him and his wife and his child, because he must have employment in order to eat bread.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate on this matter, but I give notice that immediately after the vote on the revenue bill I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the corrupt-practices act. If my distinguished friends on the opposite side of the aisle want to conduct a filibuster—or as they more politely and craftily put it, if they "want to take sufficient time to consider carefully and discuss this important measure"—we will give them an opportunity. We will ascertain whether it is for the purpose of perfecting the bill or whether it is for the purpose of killing time. It will not take 24 hours to develop that fact, and only a few days to satisfy the American people perfectly well what the purpose of certain Republican leaders is in their hostility and opposition to the passage of a corrupt-practices act.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m., Thursday, August 24, 1916) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, August 25, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 25, 1916.

(Legislative day of Monday, August 21, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Overman	Smoot
Bankhead	Hardwick	Penrose	Sterling
Beckham	Husting	Phelan	Taggart
Brady	Jones	Pittman	Thomas
Bryan	Kenyon	Ransdell	Thompson
Chamberlain	Kern	Robinson	Underwood
Colt	Lane	Shafroth	Vardaman
Culberson	McLean	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Cummins	Martin, Va.	Sherman	Weeks
Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Dillingham	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

Mr. JONES. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is absent on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. SHIELDS answered to his name when called.

Mr. CHILTON and Mr. REED entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is a matter of regret to me that in the closing days of the session so much valuable time is lost every morning in securing a quorum, but I presume there is a good reason for it.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is so much noise in the Chamber that we can not hear what the Senator is saying.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was expressing regret. I will say to my friend the Senator from North Carolina, that in the closing days of the session so much valuable time is lost each morning in securing a quorum, but I ventured to add that I presume there is a good reason for it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to join him in that expression of regret, and I want to say to Senators on this side of the Chamber especially, as well as Senators on the other side of the Chamber, that I think the business of the Senate would be greatly facilitated and we would finally get away from here much earlier if Senators would recognize the obligation and the importance of being here promptly when the Senate convenes every day. We lose nearly half an hour by reason of the delay of just a few Senators to be in the Chamber on time.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. POMERENE. I was not aware that the Senator had the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply desire to say that I was detained at a meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee. Otherwise I would have been here.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will offer the same explanation for the rest of the membership of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggested that I had no doubt that there was a good reason for the absence of Senators.

TARGET PRACTICE IN THE NAVY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a further communication from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, touching upon target practice in the Navy, which will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The communication is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 23, 1916.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: In order to avoid any misunderstanding of my letter of August 18, 1916, attention is invited to the fact that the number of hits recorded therein for day individual practice of the various ships are the hits as determined on a 30 by 90 foot target from the results of the camera observations of the practice.

The number of hits assigned by the umpires at the time are not accurate, as many of the hits are obliterated by succeeding shots during the course of the firing.

For the division practice the table of hits are those assigned by the umpires, as it is impracticable to obtain accurate camera observations of four targets with four ships firing at the same time.

Forwarded herewith is a table giving the number of hits assigned by the umpires for the day individual practice.

Sincerely, yours,

W. S. BENSON,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Hits on 30 by 90 foot screens, at day individual practice, as assigned by the umpires:

Florida	3
Kansas	5
Louisiana	10
Michigan	7
Nebraska	9
New Jersey	16
New York	8
Rhode Island	1
South Carolina	6

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

PROTECTION HAS VINDICATED ITSELF.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if there is one subject which, more than all others, affects the well-being of the United States as a Nation and as individuals—employer and employee alike—and therefore merits careful and conscientious consideration at our hands, it is the protective tariff. During the long period of my service in this body the tariff has been the topic which has the most deeply attracted my attention, and I have frequently taken the opportunity of addressing the Senate upon the subject in the hope that such observations as I might make would so impress themselves upon my fellow Senators and the country as to leave no doubt in the mind of any fair-minded man that the theory and practice of protecting home industries by levying an import duty upon competing products is not only the correct idea in the abstract but that so to do is our bounden duty as legislators in the exercise of our functions under the Constitution.

While I have always endeavored to be liberal and open-minded on the subject, and have sometimes been almost persuaded that in some respects others have been nearer right than I when they differed from my preconceived opinions, yet never under any circumstances have I found occasion to believe that I have been in the slightest measure wrong or inconsistent in my loyal adherence to the principles of protection. And now at this important epoch in the world's history, and at a most critical juncture in the affairs of our own Nation, it is with a conviction stronger than ever that I again proclaim myself an apostle of the doctrine of adequate protection to American industries and American labor.

In the presentation of tariff matters heretofore I have covered facts in a more or less chronological order, so that I now find that a compendium of my discussions of this subject would form a sort of history of the United States in its tariff aspects from the first act of Congress, July 4, 1789, down to that period when, in and around 1906, there appeared to be a pronounced reaction in the minds of many who had been up to that time stalwart in their maintenance of the standards of protection. It is, therefore, principally of events which have occurred since 1906 that I wish to direct attention to-day.

MAGNIFICENT PROSPERITY UNDER DINGLEY LAW.

Up to that time the country ever since the enactment of the Dingley law, in 1897, had been rejoicing in magnificent prosperity; and if we ever had reason to be truly thankful for ideal conditions, it was in 1906, when we were reaping to the fullest the advantages of that most beneficent legislation in all our history. It is true that we had by degrees adopted more expensive modes of living, just as had the other progressive peoples of the world, but this was indicative of the prosperity that had visited us, and which had enabled us to regard as necessaries the luxuries of former days—but, of course, at an increased cost. Our National Treasury was full, our business concerns solvent; all the wheels of industry were turning; every smokestack was kept hot; wages were higher and hours shorter than ever before; and the farmer was receiving adequate returns for his labor and investments.

A MISTAKEN POLICY.

There was no definite, fixed starting point to the movement of which I am about to speak, but along in 1906 it had become evident that certain forces were working to unsettle the minds of the people and to create dissatisfaction with the order of things as they then existed. The field was being prepared for the sowing, and the seeds of discord were about ready for planting. Certain politicians began to make speeches in which pointed allusions were made to "the spirit of unrest" said to be abroad in the land. Certain other men took up the cry and further spread the news that discontent was brewing—or that if it was not, it ought to be. This was the planting of the seed. It was noticeable that most of this talk emanated from a certain coterie of men who had determined by every possible means at their command, fair and unfair, to break down the protective policy of the Republican Party and to discredit the acknowledged leaders of that policy. It was then that spellbinders gave currency to the startling theory that the increased cost of living was due to the excessive rates provided by the Dingley law. Free traders eagerly seized upon this idea and made the best possible use of it for their purposes.

The Democratic press found in the propaganda an alluring field for agitation and denunciation. Magazine publishers and contributors found this a prolific topic for space writing. By this time the infection had spread to large proportions, and the "unrest" that started as a figment of the imagination had become something real, being then no "fitful dream" by any means. The seed was bearing fruit. The germs had been spread so rapidly and so thoroughly, and so many had been inoculated, that the belief had become epidemic. And it is no wonder, for the propagandists were being hailed (as they intended to be) as the apostles of a new gospel, and this was the political capital which they were seeking. And then the Democrats everywhere could see the chances that it afforded them. The Democratic leaders had so often told the masses that they were "unrestful" that they really began to feel the symptoms in their blood.

Never before had a people, supposed to be staid, dignified, and conservative, like our own, been so carried off its feet by a single falsehood. Thousands of our citizens were made to believe that the protective tariff had caused the advance in prices. If they have not long since seen their error, they surely can find it in the even higher prices under our present near-free-trade régime.

I have mentioned this incident at some length because it has an important bearing on the history of the country, and contributed largely to Republican defeat in 1912.

FALSE TEACHING AND ITS RESULT.

Remarkable as it may seem, a few men who had been, and who even then called themselves, Republicans went about making speeches all over the land as well as in both Houses of Congress that were printed in the Democratic campaign textbook and used with great effect on the stump. Some newly elected Congressmen, from Republican districts, came to Washington to await the opening of Congress and spent their time getting interviewed, in which interviews they were quoted as saying that, first of all, they favored a "perpendicular" revision of the tariff, an utterly absurd and unscientific method. One of the greatest political forces at work, however, was the Publishers' Trust, which sought the free admission of paper and pulp, especially from Canada. Women also demanded reductions in the tariff on gloves and hosiery. Shoe manufacturers demanded free hides so that, as they claimed, shoes might be cheaper. Many demanded a reduction of the wool tariff so that clothes would cost less. The thing once started, there seemed to be no end to the demands. Some of the demands had the outward appearance of reasonableness, but it made no difference to the so-called "tariff reformers" whether or not they were logical. It was useless to show them that prices had advanced as well on articles on the free list as on protected articles and to remind them that prices on protected articles were in many cases cheaper than they had been before protection. Professional importers were, of course, busy with arguments against protection. Democratic newspapers were in their element and had no scruples against making proselytes by any method possible. One of the leading dailies of the country openly charged that under the protective tariff beef from the United States was being sold in England for less than here, when Government statistics showed that no beef was being shipped out of this country, the entire production being consumed at home. So far did this disaffection go and so long did it continue that in the campaign of 1908 Republican State conventions made modified tariff demands in their platforms, and some failed to pledge their hearty allegiance to the principles of protection, as had been customary theretofore.

GOOD MEN SACRIFICED.

Certain Republicans began to disclaim responsibility for what they called the radical provisions of the Dingley law, and began looking about for a Jonah upon whom they might heap the burden of blame and visit the penalties attaching thereto. These men, with the active assistance of the Democrats, selected for this sacrifice a man who had served his country in the House of Representatives 30 years, and at all times with more than ordinary honor and distinction, and who, in that position, had consistently, continuously, and honorably advocated the protective tariff system as the one sure and logical means for the perpetuation of an industrial system which never has had a parallel in the history of the world. This man who had so earnestly and ably, so long and so successfully defended the best interests of our country, and than whom no greater patriot nor more faithful servant has ever been in the public service, was JOSEPH GURNEY CANNON. They declared that "Cannonism must go," and this cry was echoed all over the land. The chorus was joined in, it must be remembered, by a few Republicans of unquestioned power, whose word became law. And then, to show the sincerity of their convictions and their willingness to throw overboard all who stood in their way, the Democrats were permitted to select as Mr. CANNON'S confederate a man who, out of the abundance of his learning and energy, had for years performed the difficult task connected with the chairmanship of the Senate Committee on Finance; a man who had always, in season and out of season, been true to the Republican faith, and who had constantly and untiringly worked to bring out invaluable facts that have been used to advantage for the benefit of the Nation.

This man, Nelson W. Aldrich, was chosen for attack and defamation. His clear view enabled him to penetrate the beyond; and he was able to render service of such inestimable value that few of us can even now realize the worth of the man or appreciate the value of his services to the country. But the word had passed that Aldrichism and Cannonism were responsible for all the wrongs that existed in the body politic, including the increased prices of everything, whether the articles were on the free list or not. And I regret to say that many of those who knew better assisted in discrediting those men, hoping thereby to persuade the country into the belief that they were trying to purify the party. But the great bulk of the party remained true to the fundamental principles of their political faith, and they now have the satisfaction of seeing a united Republican Party going forth under the banner of protection to win back the country from the political fate that befell it.

AN UNFORTUNATE PLATFORM DECLARATION.

Conditions were such, upon the eve of the 1908 elections, that even the Republican national convention went so far as to adopt a plank in its platform declaring for a revision of the tariff and "the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries." It was not the flat-footed, square-toed declaration of unabated allegiance that we were accustomed to; and "for the first time in its history the Republican Party entered upon a campaign of defense and apology," as was well said by the American Economist in commenting on it about two years later. This paper went on to say:

> It framed an indictment against itself and then pleaded guilty to that indictment. It confessed to having enacted a bad tariff law, a tariff law with "too much protection" in it.

However, upon this platform William Howard Taft was elected, and promptly, in 1909, Congress proceeded to prepare a bill in conformity with the platform and with pledges made upon the stump.

During the 50 years from 1860 to 1909, inclusive, our population had increased from thirty millions to ninety millions, or 200 per cent, and our savings bank deposits had increased from one hundred and fifty millions to four billions, or 2,700 per cent. The principle of protection had been thoroughly proven as the wisest possible legislation; we had the best tariff law ever framed, and the power to continue it in force; but the platform pledges of a party must be kept, as those of the Republican Party always have been, and this was to be no exception.

Hon. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, with his long experience as a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, became chairman; and under his skillful guidance, ably seconded by the Finance Committee of the Senate, then headed by Mr. Aldrich, there was finally evolved the act of August 5, 1909, known as the Payne-Aldrich Act—a monument to the wisdom of the Republican majority in both Houses, and to the everlasting honor of the party, as the bill was in strict compliance with the party pledge.

There was no pledge of downward revision in the tariff plank of 1908, but nevertheless reductions were made in the new tariff law, but in such fashion as to hurt American industries as little as might be. Of the 2,024 numbers in the entire list, material reductions were made upon 654 items, all of which were necessaries and were valued at five billions, and some of these were put on the free list. All of the increases that were made were upon luxuries, 220 in number and valued at two hundred and forty-one millions, and the duties remained unchanged on 1,120 articles.

IMPORTS INCREASED, EXPORTS DIMINISHED.

Under this law imports were not discouraged, but they increased at a rapid rate, the total for the fiscal year 1910 being two hundred and forty-six millions greater than during the previous year under the Dingley Act, and one hundred and twenty-three millions more than for any year in the history of the Nation. Exports diminished at an even greater ratio, and our trade balance fell to one hundred and eighty-seven millions—the smallest since 1896. Under the Dingley law our trade balance had averaged five hundred and twelve millions. In fact, we were, before long, selling American securities in London to pay for our increased imports. The corporation-tax law was a part of this legislation, and this assisted somewhat in making up the deficit in import duties.

It is needless to say that prices not only remained as high as before, but actually increased, not only in the United States but in free-trade England, as well as throughout Europe generally. The placing of hides on the free list was a great boon to Germany and Argentina. Many American tanneries closed; our producers received less money for their hides, which were tanned abroad, and leather sold here for higher prices. Fifty cents per pair was added to the price of shoes, and these prices have continued to advance. So late as June 27 of this year a committee from the National Retail Shoe Dealers' Association was reported in the Washington Post as saying that shoes had already advanced on an average $1 per pair. Thus if each person in the United States bought one pair it would be a tax of $100,000,000 on the consuming public. To be sure, this fact was charged to the European embargo upon raw hides; but long before the war we lost the leather industry and paid an advance of several millions in our shoe bill alone because of this one item on the free list in the Payne-Aldrich bill. Had we retained the duty we would have retained the industry and paid to our own labor at least a part of what we were and are contributing to foreign tanneries, as well as keeping our shoe bill down. This was a Republican mistake, protection having been abandoned for free trade, with the usual result.

If there have been instances of saving in price by means of removing or reducing the tariff, the facts have not been so widely advertised as to be of common knowledge. On the other hand, in practically every case the opposite effect has resulted, the amount of reduction of the duty having often been added to the price of the commodity, and in some cases the foreign countries have put an export tax on the items from which the duty had been removed.

Mr. President, these instances are pointed out to show not that the Payne-Aldrich Act was bad, but that the "little journeys" which it made in the direction of tariff reduction and free trade were disastrous, as far as they extended. On the whole the law proved wholesome, for the protection which it retained was very beneficial, and prosperity was generally preserved along the lines covered by a sufficient rate of duty, and by the end of 1911 we had again become exceedingly prosperous, notwithstanding we suffered from the loss of business wherever concessions had been made to the free-trade demands.

The act of 1909 also contained a section authorizing the President to exercise his discretion in applying the maximum or minimum tariff rates under certain conditions prescribed in the act, and also authorized him to employ such persons as he required to furnish him information to assist in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him and to assist the officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws. The persons so employed were improperly styled a "tariff board," and they acted as such, rather than in the capacity contemplated by the law. While the board did some good work, the results were not what was expected, and the board went out of existence.

The Senate, in the meantime, appointed a committee to investigate the causes of the high cost of living, in order that it might be demonstrated whether or not the protective tariff was in any way responsible, which was asserted by the Democratic Party. Protracted investigations were made, and I need not now remind the Senate that no such indictment was found.

THE UNFORTUNATE CANADIAN RECIPROCITY AGREEMENT.

One of the most striking events in the tariff history of the country was the agitation, commenced by President Taft, for an agreement between the United States and the Dominion of Canada whereby each country was to waive all or a part of the customs duties upon certain imports to one country from the other. January 26, 1911, the President transmitted to the House of Representatives the result of his negotiations with two cabinet ministers from Canada, providing for certain reciprocal relations that were to be established, subject to the approval of Congress on the one hand and of the Canadian Parliament on the other. There was a joker in it, however, which abolished the duty on paper and pulp coming from Canada, without any corresponding concession from that country, and which was overlooked until too late. The other concessions were also grossly unequal, for we were at that time selling to the Dominion two hundred and forty millions annually, with a trade balance in our favor of about eighty millions, and besides that the changes contemplated appeared to be very largely directed against the agricultural products of the United States, which were to be unprotected against Canada.

This caused much consternation among the Republicans, but the Democrats were of course delighted with the proposition, and the American farmers were aghast. The measure was characterized, in no uncertain terms, as "jughandled," and "lopsided," and it could not have passed the House of Representatives as then constituted had it been submitted to that body. However, the fall elections of 1910 (in which the high cost of living had been adroitly used and in which the farmer vote had shown its resentment toward the President for his "reciprocity" policy) had resulted in the assurance that the next House would be Democratic by a majority of 63, and the indications were that the Senate would have but a small Republican margin, so that it was clearly probable that the House would pass any measure that smacked of free trade, and it was barely possible that the Senate would follow suit.

Canadian reciprocity, so called, was properly branded as a free-trade measure, and the chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means said of it, with reference to the protective tariff, "This will make a break in the dike." It was certain to lead to difficulties with other countries under the "favored nation" clause, and there would have been reprisals visited upon us. These and other strong arguments were used against the measure, but to little use. Certain words uttered by President McKinley in his Buffalo speech in September, 1901, were distorted in the attempt to make it appear that this heresy had been in his mind at the time and that he had given it to the people as his last will and testament. What President McKinley said on that occasion was this:

> We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor—and he declared that he believed in "sensible trade relations" with countries producing noncompetitive products; but he certainly never favored reciprocity with our nearest competitor, producing the same class of articles that we do, and would not have regarded the sacrifice of an $80,000,000 trade balance as "sensible trade relations."

But the bait of cheaper potatoes, eggs, butter, flour, and so forth, was greedily swallowed by the masses dwelling in the cities, even if the American producers of these foodstuffs were made to suffer. They had no chance. President Taft called an extraordinary session of the Democratic Congress for the purpose of passing the measure, and it was carried in the House by a vote of 267 to 89, aided by the votes of 66 Republicans. The Senate passed it by a vote of 53 to 27, some of the most radical of the Republican Members of this body being induced to stand by the Republican President; but I am happy to say that practically all of these have since declared themselves against that kind of legislation.

It later developed that the Canadian Parliament refused to accept our proffer—or, rather, to back up its cabinet ministers—and "Canadian reciprocity" was dead, except that the clause relating to free admission of paper and paper pulp from Canada was in force without any reciprocal action in our favor, and it has never yet been repealed. That mistake has resulted in giving the business almost entirely to Canada, and in a very material increase in prices of paper to American publishers.

During 1911 there were several abortive attempts on the part of the new Congress to secure other free-trade legislation. To soothe the wounded feelings of the farmers, whose products were to be injured by those from Canada, a so-called farmers' free list was enacted by the Democrats, but President Taft vetoed the absurd measure. Another bill, reducing the tariff on cotton goods, metals, and chemicals, met the same fate, and an act making sweeping reductions in the wool schedule fared no better.

A FREE-TRADE NOMINATION.

The Democratic convention at Baltimore in 1912 placed in nomination the present incumbent of the White House, Gov.

Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, an avowed believer in the doctrine of free trade. Such a nomination was not justified by the attitude of the country, either before or after the campaign, and would have left little trace upon the history of the Nation but for the factional differences among Republicans. Not even the Democrats, as a rule, were able to share the radical views of Mr. Wilson upon the tariff, and he could not have secured the nomination by a primary election; but, by a set of circumstances which could not possibly have been foreseen, and after the convention had practically indicated its preference for another, the hand of fate pointed to the advocate of free trade. His platform declared it—to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government under the Constitution has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue.

And demanded that—the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of government honestly and economically administered—the excessive prices result in a large measure from the high-tariff laws enacted and maintained by the Republican Party.

Charging that—

Not content with the object lessons that had so recently been enacted before their very eyes, by which the entire country had been conclusively shown that free trade, and not a protective tariff, was responsible for high prices, the Democratic Party started out to accomplish by misstatements the destruction of all the prosperity which had been so hard won through generations by the protective tariff exactly in proportion to the degree of protection granted.

Among other things the nominee of the Democratic Party said at Seagirt, in his speech of acceptance, that tariff schedules had been made up for the purpose of keeping as large a number as possible of the rich and influential manufacturers of the country in good humor with the Republican Party, which desired their continued financial support. He openly advocated the purchase of foreign goods rather than to further the production of such articles at home under a protective tariff; boasting that he bought his socks in Scotland because he could thereby save 50 per cent on them—the while he was drawing a $10,000 salary from the State of New Jersey, raised by the taxation of a people very largely dependent upon manufacturing.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Democratic platform contained a clause favoring the ultimate attainment of the principles therein enumerated "by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry," this candidate went up and down the country declaiming against the tariff—of the practical bearings of which he evidently knew little or nothing—and threatening it with near extinction the while he was admitting that much of our industry was indebted to it for existence. He was so imperfectly informed regarding the tariff that he should have avoided its discussion; but, as it was the only issue, and as he had insisted that it should be so, he had to do his best to mislead the people. When a delegation of farmers visited him during the campaign, he sought to augment their dissatisfaction with President Taft and with the Republican Party by saying that—the farmer does not produce any of the things that get any of the material benefit from the tariff, and consumes all of the things which are taxed under the tariff system.

He should have known that the direct opposite was true; and when he said that if the metals bill had not been vetoed it would have cheapened agricultural implements, the farmers themselves knew that agricultural implements were already admitted free from countries that charged no duty upon imports of the same class from this country, and hence they understood the fallacy of the claim.

A STRIKING CONTRAST.

In direct contrast to the principles enunciated by the Democrats, the Republican platform reaffirmed its belief in the protective tariff, expressing the conviction that it had been of the greatest benefit in developing our resources, diversifying our industries, and protecting our workmen against competition with cheaper labor abroad; and holding—that the import duties should be high enough, while yielding a sufficient revenue, to protect adequately American industries and wages.

It will be noted that this plank provides first for revenue and then for protection; but we have done better since then, and now assert that protection is the paramount consideration, adequate revenue being thereby assured.

As between the two parties and the principles enunciated by them, there was a strong predilection among the voters for the policy that is constructive—a developer of industries and a creator of wages. They were and are opposed to the Democratic Party on general principles, and especially when Democratic leaders make threats most terrifying to labor and capital. Added to these was the threat of the presidential nominee to "hang as high as Haman any man or set of men who should start a panic," when he alone was already creating a panic by declaring his policies and by his intemperate utterances, which destroyed whatever confidence may have been inspired by the promise in the Democratic platform not to injure or destroy any legitimate industry.

A DISASTROUS CAMPAIGN.

It is needless for me to recount the unfortunate circumstances under which the Republican Party was disrupted in 1912, and the votes of protectionists divided between two candidates. It is also well known that Mr. Taft's Canadian policy had alienated the farmer vote, and that many others joined them in supporting the Progressive candidate, whereby the Democratic ticket received a majority of the electoral vote. It is gratifying, however, to remember that a large majority of the votes cast in that election were for protection, and that the party now in power was the choice of a minority of 1,300,000 votes. And it should also be borne in mind that the administration does not now, never has, and steadily refuses to follow the behest of the majority of the country's electorate.

Notwithstanding the administration had been placed in power by a minority of the people, and in spite of the wishes of the great majority, President Wilson called a special session of Congress for the purpose of repealing the Payne-Aldrich Act and passing legislation to suit himself. The bill that was framed "for revenue purposes only" was intentionally remiss even in this respect, thus making necessary direct taxation of incomes, stamp taxes, and other methods of that character, which would have been rendered unnecessary by sensible and patriotic tariff legislation.

PROTECTION IGNORED.

When the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill was being considered the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives held its sessions behind closed doors, refusing to hear the testimony offered by American manufacturers and hastily prepared a bill to be rushed through Congress at railroad speed in face of the fact that it lopped off one hundred and fifty millions of our revenues and made no pretense of protecting the manufacturing or agricultural industries of the country. The bill was founded upon the principles enunciated in the constitution of the Confederate States, which was enacted for the benefit of an agricultural, slave-holding section of the country 50 years ago, before manufacturing had become a part of the industrial system of the South.

In my discussion of that bill before the Senate September 2, 1913, I suggested that the caption should be amended by entitling it—

A bill to reduce tariff duties, to destroy American industries, and to provide employment for the laboring men and women of foreign countries.

That proposed caption, in my opinion, correctly described what the law would inevitably bring about, for it was as unpatriotic as it was illogical, and as defective as it was inefficient. I suggested then that it was as bad a measure as any that had ever been conceived for the Government of the United States—and I have never had occasion to amend my finding in that regard. My remarks upon that occasion were brought to a conclusion by a few paragraphs which I take the liberty of now repeating—not because I was gifted with the spirit of prophecy, but to show that a little observation and the application of some common sense would have averted the disastrous effects caused by this greatest fiasco in American legislation. I said:

If our Democratic friends had only had the gift to see themselves as the country is now seeing them and the wisdom to appreciate the fact that the legislation they are engaged in will of necessity do harm to all classes of our people, the bill now under consideration would never have been prepared.

It will be recalled that Gen. Grant is credited with the wise remark that "You can always trust the Democratic Party to make a mistake at the right time," and what is occurring to-day is a fresh illustration of the correctness of Gen. Grant's observation. The bill is a monumental blunder the magnitude of which can not be overestimated.

It can well be imagined how, when the crash comes and the people of the country have risen in their might to overthrow the Democratic Party because of this legislation, the Senators on the Democratic side of this Chamber will see the unwisdom of what they are now doing; but in view of the circumstance that they will be responsible for the destruction of American industries and the lessening of the demand for American labor, they will find little comfort in contemplating the fact that the result was due to their party's political blindness and folly.

I am not an alarmist in any sense of the word, but I can not bring my mind to any other conclusion than that the contemplated legislation will inevitably bring disaster to the industries of the entire country, with suffering and sorrow as a necessary result, and I would be doing myself an injustice did I not sound a warning note. But, Mr. President, the die is cast. A Democratic President, a Democratic Congress, and a Democratic caucus have ordained that the bill shall become a law; and while it does not represent the honest convictions of a majority of the American people, it is to be forced upon the country by the representatives of a political party that has always stood in opposition to the protective doctrines of the Republican Party. The triumph will be complete, but it will be short lived, and those of us who contemplate with solicitude the result of the legislation can find satisfaction and comfort in the belief that the Government will soon again be placed in the hands of the party of protection and that this statute will in due time be superseded by a law that will adequately protect our people from the cheap labor of European and Asiatic countries.

DRUNK WITH POWER.

But the Democratic Party was drunk with power—power that had been conferred upon it by a minority of the voters—and reckless in its intoxication. When President Wilson was adding the culminating touch to that "dumping bill" he said, among a great many other things, to the jubilant coterie that had been invited to witness the deed. "I feel a very peculiar pleasure in what I have just done by way of taking part in a piece of business." It certainly was a great "piece of business," as we shall in due time see—the lowest tariff in 75 years.

The act provided for one thing which materially affected Louisiana, the abolition of the duty on sugar, to be effective three years after its passage. Whether this was genuine or a subterfuge to give the legislation the appearance of nonsectional consistency I am not certain; but it caused such a storm of protest as threatened "a break in the dike" of the solid South, and so this clause was repealed before going into effect. This event and the fact that free trade in sugar was postdated point strongly to a suspicion as to the sincerity of the original intention.

A further cut in the revenue was attempted by a provision in the act for a 5 per cent reduction of the tariff on goods imported in United States ships, but the administration held that this was violative of the international agreements then in force, and as a result it has not been put into operation.

BURDENSOME DEMOCRATIC TAXES.

The same law levied an income tax that had been made possible as an emergency measure by an amendment to the Constitution, and this was seized upon as a possible remedy for the loss in import duties; but this fell short of the expectations of the astute statesmen who devised it, and it is now proposed to increase the rates ad libitum. As most of the income is derived from the industrial States of the North, it can safely be increased by the party in power.

The corporation tax was by no means eliminated by this law, but, on the contrary, was increased by it, so that no method of direct taxation might be neglected.

All of these taxes being still insufficient, we are subjected to what the administration is pleased to call a "war tax," although it bears no relation to the European war, but is a surcharge upon our already overtaxed citizens in order to provide the necessary revenues at the expense of the American people instead of at the cost of their foreign competitors, and it is also proposed to issue bonds to meet the deficit that will even then exist in our revenues.

Numerous other vexatious forms of taxation are provided in the bill, the chief burden of which will also fall on the Northern States.

The war in Europe, which broke out in August, 1914, when the near-free-trade tariff act had been in force only 10 months, created a temporary market for much of what we produce, and imports have been somewhat obstructed by embargoes, difficult transportation, shortage of foreign production, and the consumption abroad of the ordinary surplus; but, nevertheless, the low rate of duties has resulted in very large importations of foreign goods, while at the same time the war has not lessened our excise taxes or income tax, nor has it furnished an excuse for the surcharge.

A DISASTROUS 10 MONTHS UNDER THE UNDERWOOD ACT.

The history of the 10 months during which the Underwood Act was operative under normal conditions is sufficient to justify our predictions, and to further put the stamp of disapproval upon the law which, but for the war, would have ruined most of the industries of the United States, and which, if still in effect at the close of that war, will make this country the dumping ground for all the surplus products of foreign labor.

The first direct result of the tariff reductions was to bring into the United States the first day that it was in force immense quantities of foreign-made goods that had been stored in bonded warehouses in anticipation of this legislation. In the first 10 months of the Underwood law there was an increase of $88,000,000 in imports and a decrease of $342,000,000 in exports.

Sugar factories closed down, or were operated under reduced conditions.

Steel mills drew their fires.

Woolen mills retrenched.

Many cotton mills were forced out of business.

Factories that remained open reduced their output.

Stocks depreciated. The Philadelphia Press estimated this loss to be $1,000,000 per day.

Three million wage earners were out of employment, the largest percentage since 1894–1897.

Freight cars to the number of 350,000 were idle, as were the locomotives, engineers, freight handlers, firemen, and others depending upon their operation.

Sixty per cent of the railroad mileage of the country was in the hands of receivers.

Dividends were passed.

Railroad gross earnings dropped one hundred millions in the 10 months, or ten millions a month.

Bread lines were the longest ever known, and there was the greatest demand for charity.

When we predicted these things we were called "calamity howlers," but I am reciting history now.

Disappointed and suffering citizens, grown desperate by these conditions, when they ventured to ask for relief, were told by the President that the apparent distress was "purely psychological."

By June of 1915 our trade balance was wiped out and reversed, showing imports of two hundred and thirty-three millions more than our exports.

What an array of incriminating evidence; what an indictment of the men who set themselves up as superior to the will of the people; what an account of their stewardship to give to the 100,000,000 innocent people whose confidence had been abused. The record is certainly a terrible indictment against the Democratic Party, and it does not require a great stretch of the imagination to predict that never again will such an industrial catastrophe occur as was brought about by this minority-elected administration.

FREE TRADE A RELIC OF THE PAST.

There is a fictitious prosperity at the present time, due to the European war, but when the war ends the deadly work of the Democratic tariff law will again be in full operation.

Mr. President, free trade is but a relic of the old colonial days when our struggling ancestors were powerless to assert themselves, but it was expelled with the first breath drawn by the American Congress on Independence Day of 1789. That was the "new freedom," and any retrogression to free trade is but a resubmission to the yoke of foreign power. Nowhere among the nations is free trade longer tolerated. England, with her vast capital invested in the producing countries is finding it intolerable and is getting ready for a protective tariff of some kind. But, with all our experience and with all the advantages to be gained from the experience of others, we have men, prominent in the councils of the Nation, so blind that they can not, or so obstinate that they will not, see the folly of our present course of adopting the very policy which became intolerable to our forefathers and which never will again be borne by a free and enlightened Republic.

Our imports of foreign goods for May of this year—notwithstanding the war in Europe—were the largest on record, totaling $229,000,000, an increase of $11,000,000 over April and an excess of $82,000,000 over the May average from 1911 to 1914.

For the year ending with May our imports totaled $2,110,000,000, an increase of $436,000,000 over the preceding year. Of the May imports, 65.7 per cent were entered free of duty. If anybody thinks that we have become the "dumping ground for Europe," just let him wait until the war is over. The worst is yet to come. Of course, this added surplus of foreign goods displaced an equal amount of goods of American manufacture.

PROTECTION A NECESSITY.

We are urged by our friends on the other side of the Chamber to take the tariff out of politics. What we are going to do is to take politics out of the tariff and treat it as a natural, matter-of-fact business affair, just as we treat any other phase of our governmental operations. It can be perfectly adjusted to our conditions and requirements so that it need not cause a ferment every time it is mentioned. It should be a staple article, like our currency or water supply or transportation facilities. When we realize the immense sums of money invested in this country that can be swept away by a single fluctuation of tariff rates, it is readily understood why the tariff should be permanent and steady. It is possible for an American manufacturer to estimate his cost of production by summing up the fixed charges of operation and to add his overhead, selling, advertising, interest, and depreciation accounts and to then calculate a fair profit upon the whole; but whenever a concatenation of circumstances like those of 1912 shall change the political complexion of the administration and of Congress the manufacturer's product may be rendered unsalable by the stroke of a pen or by the moving of a decimal point in the rate of duty. So long as it is possible for an act of Congress to confiscate the property of a citizen, it is possible for ignorant or unprincipled politicians to commit a wholesale crime against society.

PROTECTION DEVELOPS COMPETITION.

The protective tariff is not a friend of monopoly. On the contrary, it is and always has been, in principle and in practice, the parent of domestic competition, and has worked out for the benefit of independent enterprise in the manufactures and arts. On the other hand, free trade is fully capable of and certain to foster monopoly. For instance, take a highly capitalized industry like the steel business, in which there are a few tremendous concerns and hundreds of small ones, each operating successfully in its own sphere and in proportion to the capital invested under a protective tariff, as heretofore. Now, then, take away the tariff and the two or three big concerns would possibly be able, because of their organization, equipment, and holdings of iron mines, to compete with foreign rivals, but the hundreds of independents not similarly situated would surely go to the wall. In this way free trade would be creating a monopoly that protection has prevented.

As to the Democratic charge that it is a breeder of high prices, the protective tariff has been completely vindicated. The accusations so frequently made have been so often exploded that the subject is perhaps unworthy of further discussion; but I will venture to point out a few facts which absolutely refute this contention. The history of the tin-plate industry in this country is well known as having been created and fostered by the tariff until tin plate was produced at a cost to the consumer which was a fraction of the former prices paid to foreigners. Steel rails furnish another most striking instance. Silk, pearl buttons, wire nails, woolen manufactures, and other commodities, have been similarly reduced in cost to our citizens, while our manufactures have made possible a state of society in which the wage earner has become a self-respecting, well-to-do, prosperous citizen of whom we are proud, and not the object of charity, which free trade would make him.

A FREE-TRADE EXPERIMENT AND THE RESULT.

You may say, "Yes; but having now established our infant industries, why not let them stand, creep, walk, or fall down, according to their strength?" Why, we have tried that for the last three years on several items. The present war has obscured many of the facts; but take, for instance, the matter of hides again. Free trade in hides has not only discouraged the production of cattle, but has closed our tanneries, so that we have been dependent upon foreign countries for the finished product. Our breeders and tanners have lost their living, our hides bring less, and we pay more for leather and shoes. This is a glaring example now in everyday operation of how free trade compels us to sell in the cheapest and buy in the dearest market; and, incidentally, it conclusively shows, what I started out to show, that the protective tariff does not raise prices, while free trade frequently increases the cost of living.

NEED OF PROTECTION AGAINST CHEAP LABOR.

There is no question as to the present and future need of protection against the cheap labor of Oriental countries. The most complete and convincing proof of this need is to be found in the tables setting forth the wages paid in Japan that have appeared from week to week in the American Economist for several months past. These tables are taken from the official reports for the year 1915 of the Japanese Department of Finance. They show conclusively that in similar lines of labor wages in the United States are many times higher than in Japan. Surely we must have protection to meet that kind of competition.

Labor in the production of finished products is conservatively estimated to be 90 per cent of their value. This is the strongest argument that I can offer in support of a protective tariff. Let us manufacture our products here, and maintain the prosperity and well-being of our own people and of those who crowd our shores asking for work; men who are helping us to build up a commonwealth of strong, home-loving, well-informed citizens, who take a pride in the country and its institutions; a race that improves with each succeeding generation by reason of better conditions and increased opportunity. If we spend our money at home and give work to our own people they are bound to spend the proceeds of their labor in our communities, and it is their money that makes for our prosperity.

NO SUCH THING AS RAW MATERIALS.

Some will perhaps say that I am right, but that I should except raw materials from these statements. My answer is that there is no such thing as raw material, except what is known in the law as real estate. Everything that we possess in this country is, at least partly, a manufactured product, except the soil and what it contains—and the trees go with the soil. The moment the ore or coal or gas or oil is extracted from the ground, or the tree is felled in the woods, or the hay is cut in the meadow, it is a manufactured article—the product of labor. Let us not then deceive ourselves with the argument that wool or hides or lumber or iron ore or ingot copper is raw material and therefore entitled to entry at our customhouses free of duty, for every pound or ton or foot of such material imported into the United States has deprived us of something to which we are entitled, and has injured our fellow citizens to that extent.

LABOR, NOT CAPITAL, NEEDS PROTECTION.

The underlying principle of protection is not that capital requires protection but that labor needs it. This comes largely from the fact that the efficiency which we demand, the living conditions that are necessary in this country, the education which is compulsory, the high standards of morals required under our laws—all looking to the bettering of the social fabric—can not be maintained or enjoyed without each receiving a rate of pay that is commensurate with what is expected of the earner.

For these reasons our wages are higher, and for that reason our country is better, our standards are the loftiest, our labor the most efficient, our people the most intelligent and prosperous of any nation on the globe.

Now, then, if exactly the same conditions obtained in foreign countries as here, and if competing products were made by people who enjoyed the same rates of compensation and the same high privileges, and worked the same number of hours, we would need no protective tariff. We could not have absolute free trade, even under those conditions, but would require a tariff for revenue.

College professors who teach free trade seem to stop short in their economics, for they fail to grasp the true principle of protection. They omit the analysis and jump to the conclusion that all men are equal—taking this for an axiom. And then they try to argue that this is a natural conclusion, when, in fact and in philosophy, it is most unnatural and preposterous.

FREE TRADE BREAKS DOWN OUR SOCIAL SYSTEM.

To succeed under the one theory that the tariff can be abolished, or under the other that a tariff for revenue only can be Americanized, they must first break down our social system and reduce our American mechanics and farmers, indeed, of everyone who helps with his hands to produce anything in the United States, to the standard of the underpaid subservient, low-class artisan that he is in Europe and the Orient to-day. Not only this, but these theorists must again make over the able, educated, God-fearing father of an American family into the poorly paid laborer of Europe, or the rice-eating, idolatrous, hut-dwelling coolie that his competitor in Asia is to-day.

I do not know that I have made myself clear; but all will see the inequality of asking our people, upon whom we are depending for all that we expect our race to be, to work for the wages that are paid in producing the goods that compete with our own; nor would it be fair to ask a man to work 12 or 14 hours a day because it is done in foreign countries; nor would we wish to have our children work in the factories five or six hours a day, after having been in school from 7 o'clock in the morning, as is practiced in Germany and elsewhere.

These are a few of the reasons why I say that protection is largely a sociological problem and that revenue must be a by-product only. The real principle and the true economic spirit of our new Nation requires a protective tariff first, "and all these shall be added unto you."

THE DEMOCRATIC TARIFF PLANK.

Mr. President, the Democratic tariff plank in the St. Louis platform is evidently the result of superficial reasoning; otherwise it would have been less contradictory and evasive. As it is, it means so little as to be hardly worthy of careful analysis. It says:

> We reaffirm our belief in the doctrine of a tariff for the purpose of providing sufficient revenue for the operation of the Government economically administered, and unreservedly indorse the Underwood law as truly exemplifying that doctrine.

How can a party declare for a "sufficient revenue" and then unreservedly indorse the Underwood law, which does not and was never intended to provide sufficient revenue for the Government? But perhaps the committee on resolutions thought that if the Government had been economically administered (which it has not), then the Underwood law would have been "sufficient." It is no secret that the revenues under the Underwood law, with the greatest imports ever known, have fallen miserably short of the requirements of government, and that with all the special, excise, corporation, income, and other taxes we still face a big deficit, with a bond issue confronting us in the ultimate. Again, the plank reads:

> We recognize that tariff rates are necessarily subject to change to meet changing conditions in the world's production and trade.

Such considerations have no place in a tariff-for-revenue-only platform. All that they have to do in framing a revenue tariff is to figure out the budget and fix the rates accordingly, just so as to raise the certain amount of money that seems to be necessary. It seems rather inconsistent to take anything else into account after making the declaration first quoted. But if they are going to give weight to other considerations, should they not consider the welfare of our own people rather than the interests of our foreign competitors?

AN IMPOSSIBLE TARIFF COMMISSION.

While the platform indorses the plan for "a nonpartisan tariff commission to make impartial and thorough study of every economic fact that may throw light upon either our past or upon our future fiscal policy with regard to the imposition of taxes or with regard to the changing conditions under which our trade is carried on," it is not stated to whom this commission shall report, if to anyone, nor just what functions it shall perform. It looks like an attempt to create the impression that the Democratic Party is willing to make an intelligent study of the tariff if it should be allowed to retain power. As to this each will draw his own inference. In reality it means that the correction of existing Democratic tariff wrongs and blunders is to be indefinitely postponed if that party remains in power. The term "nonpartisan" is a paradox, as no American citizen, outside of schools for the feeble-minded, can be nonpartisan as regards the tariff.

The platform does not make any mention of the deficit in the Treasury nor of the more than one and one-half billion dollar budget for the current fiscal year, but it simply indorses the Underwood law, under which the ship of state is kept on a course that brings her nearer to the rocks each succeeding day. Possibly the convention recognized, as do we, that in November next the whole country will rise up and speak, in a voice that can not be mistaken, condemning the policies outlined for the future by the Democrats, and that men will be chosen for public office who are known to have genuine convictions in favor of protection.

A PROTECTION PLATFORM.

In striking contrast to the St. Louis platform is the clear, concise, and unequivocal creed adopted at the Chicago convention, which says, regarding the tariff:

The Republican Party stands now, always has, in the fullest sense for the policy of tariff protection to American industries and American labor, and does not regard an antidumping provision as an adequate substitute. Such protection should be reasonable in amount, but sufficient to protect adequately American industry and American labor and be so adjusted as to prevent exactions by monopolies or trusts. It should, moreover, give special attention to securing the industrial independence of the United States, as in the case of dyestuffs.

Through wise tariff and industrial legislation our industries can be so organized that they will become not only a commercial bulwark but a powerful aid to national defense.

The Underwood tariff act is a complete failure in every respect. Under its administration imports have enormously increased, in spite of the fact that intercourse with foreign countries has been largely cut off by reason of the war, while the revenues of which we stand in such dire need have been greatly reduced.

Under the normal conditions which prevailed prior to the war it was clearly demonstrated that this act deprived the American producer and the American wage earner of that protection which enabled them to meet their foreign competitors, and but for the adventitious conditions created by the war would long since have paralyzed all forms of American industry and deprived American labor of its just reward.

It has not in the least reduced the cost of living, which has constantly advanced from the date of its enactment. Welfare of our people demands its repeal and the substitution of a measure which in peace as well as in war will produce ample revenue and give reasonable protection to all forms of American production in mine, forest, field, and factory.

This requires no comment, for every word means something, and its meaning is clear. Besides that, the party has a long record of kept campaign promises, and the American people always know in advance that a Republican President and a Republican Congress will carry out the pledges made to the electorate.

The fearless manner in which Republicans stand now, in the fullest sense, for the policy of tariff protection to American industries and American labor, is the attitude of men who know that they are right and know that everyone else should know it. There is no backing away from the question, no evidence of faint courage, no figuring on foreign cost plus this or that; just the plain, simple statement of what we know to be right, backed by the courage of our convictions.

It is easy to believe that everyone who reads this platform and contrasts it with the halting, vacillating, uncertain expressions of the Democratic platform, which favor a revenue tariff and then indorses a measure that has failed even as a revenue producer, will regard with favor the outspoken declaration of the Republican Party.

Many a man who has been on the political fence ever since 1906 will read the tariff planks of the two opposing parties and will say to himself, "Whatever I am or may have been, I am hereafter a member of and a worker for the party that has for its slogan the welfare of the American people and of its industries; and never again will I countenance the party that disdains to consider, in its platform or in its legislation, the well-being of the people whose affairs they seek to control."

THE EARLY PRESIDENTS WERE PROTECTIONISTS.

Mr. President, I have often quoted the early Presidents of the United States, every one of whom expressed himself in most definite terms in favor of protection. I will not take time now to repeat the inspiring language of these greatest of all American statesmen, but that all may be sure that the next President will be in full accord with his party and its policy of protection, see what Gov. Hughes said during the Taft campaign in 1908:

A policy that proposes, after the years of our development under protection, to put this Nation upon a free-trade basis is opposed to the legitimate business of the country and the common welfare.

It is not difficult to agree with Justice Hughes when he declared that free trade is opposed to the common welfare of the country. I have said in former tariff speeches, as I believed in my heart, that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber are just as patriotic and just as sincere in their convictions as I am; but I can not understand how anyone can espouse a policy so diametrically opposed to the best interests of the country and which so studiously ignores the welfare of the individual citizen.

PROTECTION SHOULD BE NATIONAL, NOT SECTIONAL.

A true patriot and a real protectionist is in favor of legislating on tariff matters for the whole country and not for the respective States or districts. We should be as strong for protection on Arizona copper as we are on New England cotton goods, as much in favor of protecting Minnesota wheat as Pennsylvania steel; as friendly to the lead and zinc of Missouri as to the manufactures of New York; in fact, our legislation should be national in its broadest sense. A witness before the Senate Finance Committee during the hearings on the Underwood bill brought out this idea in telling of what he observed in Germany. It was Mr. W. S. Rogers, of Connecticut. He was telling why the Germans could sell ball bearings in this country for less than we can produce them here, and said, in response to a question:

Why is that? Because Germany, as a Government, is protecting the Empire, while our Government is trying to protect the local fellow in each State. There they have a common desire to protect the Empire. The Saxon hates the Prussian to such an extent that he would like to see him sick abed half the time, but when it comes to the good of the 60,000,000 people in that little Empire it is "protect all of them," and the Government works hard to do it.

The tariff is for all of the people all of the time. If we are in favor of any special interest, that interest is the laboring element of the country, and that includes, of course, the farmer, the stock raiser, and every other American producer. Take away protection and in a short time we would be in a state of chaos while attempting to readjust our industrial system so as to meet the wages, hours, and living conditions of Europe and Asia.

In view, then, of what I have submitted, it will be understood why I regard it the patriotic duty of every man under our national emblem to work for, build up, and maintain a system which makes for the upbuilding of our industrial institutions—not because of the wealth that it incidentally creates, but because it is the only way in which we can contribute with certainty to the happiness, health, morals, and well-being of the people who make—the people who are—the country, which we all love and cherish.

THE VIEWS OF M'KINLEY.

On August 2, 1892, four years before he was elected President of the United States, the great apostle of protection and Americanism, William McKinley, uttered these words:

Thirty years of protection has brought us to the first rank in agriculture, in mining, and in manufacturing development. We lead all nations in the three great departments of industry. We have outstripped even the United Kingdom, which had centuries the start of us. Her fiscal policy for 50 years has been the free-trade revenue-tariff policy of the Democrats, ours for 31 years the protective-tariff policy of the Republicans. Tried by any test, measured by any standard, we lead all the rest of the world.

Mr. President, what McKinley said 24 years ago is equally as true to-day as when his words were uttered, and it requires no spirit of prophecy to discern the fact that the country will repudiate next November the tariff policy of the Democratic Party and return to the principles for which McKinley stood, and to which the Republican Party is absolutely and unqualifiedly committed.

Mr. GRONNA obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the Chair). Has the Senator from New Hampshire concluded?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have concluded, but I will listen, if the Senator from North Dakota wishes to ask a question.

Mr. GRONNA. I thought the Senator from New Hampshire had concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have concluded for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GRONNA. I shall take only a few moments, and I prefer not to yield at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, there is no Member of this Senate for whom I entertain a higher regard and esteem than the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. After listening to his very able speech, I would not now take the time of the Senate, nor do I intend to criticize what the Senator has said with reference to the protective-tariff policy; but, Mr. President, after listening carefully to what the Senator has said—and the Senator has prepared his speech with care and diligence, as he always does—I can not remain silent and admit that the revolt in the House of Representatives some years ago against the then leader JOSEPH G. CANNON was on the question of a protective tariff. The Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken. That revolt in the House of Representatives—and I may say that I was a Member of that body at that time and was also one of those who joined in that revolt—was against the policy pursued by the Presiding Officer. The revolt was made to liberalize the rules and to give every Member of the body an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. President, speaking for myself, I have no regret, nor have I any apology to make, for the action I took in then opposing Members of my own party in the House of Representatives.

One who is not entirely familiar with the record might think from the remarks made by the Senator from New Hampshire that the free-trade measure, the reciprocity agreement which President Taft tried to force upon us was supported by the so-called progressive Republicans. The record does not bear out such a statement. In order to make it perfectly clear, I want to take the opportunity at this time to insert in the RECORD the vote upon that measure.

Upon the final passage of the so-called reciprocity agreement, the RECORD shows that there were in the Senate 53 yeas and 27 nays. The Republicans who voted for the free-trade measure were as follows: Mr. Bradley, Mr. Brandegee, Mr. Briggs, Mr. Brown, Mr. Burton, and Mr. Crane——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator from North Dakota to say that he was giving the names of Senators who voted for a free-trade measure.

Mr. GRONNA. These are the Republican Senators who voted for the free-trade measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of what free-trade measure does the Senator speak?

Mr. GRONNA. The Canadian reciprocity agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh. The Senator is giving the names of the Republicans who voted for a free-trade measure?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator recall the date of the passage of that act?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I will give the date. It was July 22, 1911.

Mr. President, repeating the names of the Republicans who voted for this measure, they are as follows:

Senators Bradley, Brandegee, Briggs, Brown, Burton, Crane, Cullom, Guggenheim, Jones, Lodge, McLean, Nixon, Penrose, Perkins, Poindexter, Root, Stephenson, Townsend, Wetmore, and Works.

Among those Republicans I find three progressive Republicans—Mr. JONES, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. WORKS. Of the 27 Senators who voted against the measure I find 24 Republicans and 3 Democrats. Among the Republicans voting against this free-trade measure were Senators Borah, Bourne, Bristow, Burnham, Clapp, Clark of Wyoming, Crawford, Cummins, Curtis, Dixon, Gamble, Gronna, Heyburn, Kenyon, La Follette, Lippitt, Lorimer, McCumber, Nelson, Oliver, Page, Smith of Michigan, Smoot, and Warren.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he has the pairs before him?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, Mr. President, I also wish to announce the pairs. The Republican Senators paired against this measure were the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and the then Senator from Maine, Mr. Frye, were paired, but I do not know whether they were paired against the measure or not.

It would appear from this list, Mr. President, that the Senator from New Hampshire is hardly warranted, especially at this time, in making an attack upon those who had been known—and I am glad to say, so far as I am concerned, and I believe there are others who would be glad to join me in the statement that they are still progressive Republicans, and had it not been that some of those who are in favor of unduly high tariff rates had insisted upon those rates there would have been no revolt in the Republican Party, because the men who are known as progressive Republicans are Republicans from the standpoint of protection as much so as is the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no desire to get into a controversy with my good friend the Senator from North Dakota. I think he must have misunderstood my language. I made no attack upon anybody, and I will state to the Senator that in alluding to Mr. CANNON I did not say that the revolt was because of his protective principles; I said he was a very strong protectionist, and I simply stated the historical fact that there was a revolt. I knew that the question of the rules had much to do with the revolt. That is all. I criticized nobody, and have no disposition now to criticize anybody. I know the Senator is just as good a protectionist as I am, and I know he holds his convictions just as strongly as I do mine, and I respect him for it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am sure that there will be no quarrel between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself. I said at the outset that there is no Senator on this floor for whom I have a higher regard and respect or whom I hold in higher esteem than the Senator from New Hampshire, but I can not, Mr. President, let the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire go unchallenged.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I was not in the room when the statement to which the Senator referred was made, and I should like to inquire what was the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GRONNA. Well, Mr. President, of course the RECORD will speak for itself. The inference that I got from the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire was that there was a revolt within the Republican Party by the so-called Progressives, although he did not mention them by name, against the protective principle. So far as the revolt in the House was concerned, the question of protection did not enter into that fight at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I want now to state most emphatically that I made no such assertion as the Senator says I did. I did not use the word "Progressive." I cited an historical fact, but I did not say what was the occasion of it.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from New Hampshire said that certain men in the Republican Party led in a revolt and made an attack upon a distinguished Member of the House, JOSEPH G. CANNON, who was then Speaker of the House. That is true. The attack was made upon the Speaker of the House, and it was made by Republicans.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and I said nothing to the contrary.

Mr. GRONNA. But it was not made on account of tariff principles, nor was it made because of a demand for a reduction in tariff schedules.

Mr. GALLINGER. Nor did I say that it was.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have said about all I care to say. I wanted the RECORD to show that the men who were responsible for the revolt in the House of Representatives are not responsible for any free-trade measure. When it was proposed by the then leaders of the Republican Party to force down upon a class which by the very nature of things can not combine and create a monopoly—the farmers of this country—to give them free trade in all their products, that scheme was championed by the ultraprotectionists, by the "old guard," by what we called the "stand-pat Republicans," and not by the progressive Republicans.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, the Senator will not include me in that list, so far as the Canadian reciprocity act was concerned, because the Senator well remembers that I took a pretty active and pronounced position in opposition to it. If I have criticized anybody in what I said this morning, I think I criticized my associates who voted for that measure, because I said most of them were sorry for having done so, as I happen to know they are.

Mr. GRONNA. I admit, Mr. President, that my good friend the Senator from New Hampshire was consistent, as he always is. He opposed the reciprocity agreement, and, although he was not present when the final vote was taken, he was paired against the measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was present, but I was paired.

Mr. GRONNA. The RECORD shows that the Senator was paired against it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I understand the Senator, his position is that the difference of attitude of the so-called Progressives and the Republicans in regard to the protective principle is a matter of percentages. They both believe in protection. The Progressives believe in protection, but they do not believe in the kind of protection that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] believes in, or the kind of protection the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] believes in, or the kind of protection the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] believes in. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from North Carolina will leave out the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Utah, I can answer the question. The Progressives were not in favor of such a tariff as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] favored, as the RECORD shows, because the Senator from Pennsylvania was in favor of free trade in agricultural products, and the progressive Republicans were not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, I will put it in another way if the Senator objects on account of my individualizing. As I understand, the Progressives believe in protection, but they do not believe in the kind of protection the Republican Party as it was organized and controlled in the campaign of 1912 believed in.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, Mr. President, the progressive Republicans are perfectly willing—I have no right to speak for anyone except myself—and speaking merely for myself, I was perfectly willing to follow the platform of 1912, and I believe that all the Republicans, regardless of what they may be called, were willing to live up to the provisions of that platform. But I believe that the leaders of our party misconstrued that platform. There was a demand all over this land for a reduction of tariff schedules. It was used upon the stump by Republicans who were candidates for office.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, if the Senator will pardon me again, as I understand the Senator now, while the Progressives believe in protection, they do not believe and did not believe in protection as exemplified in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, again speaking for myself only, if the Senator from North Carolina wants to know my belief with respect to the protective principle, I believe in a protective tariff, but I believe in a tariff that will protect all industries alike, and especially those industries where there is no combination in control of products, either the large majority or the entire products of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator again whether the Progressive Party was not in part organized as a protest——

Mr. GRONNA. I hope the Senator will not ask me anything about the Progressive Party. I never have belonged to the so-called Progressive Party. I never have belonged to any other party than the Republican Party.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator has been differentiating the position of the Progressives and the Republicans on the tariff, and I think I have a right to ask him a question with reference to that to get his viewpoint. As I understand the Senator, his position with respect to this matter is that the organization of the Progressive Party was in the nature of a protest against the abuses of protection and the high rates carried in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator from North Carolina. There was a revolt within the Republican Party against the unduly high protective rates on certain schedules. There is no question about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was my understanding. Now, I want to ask the Senator another question. As I understand the position of the old-line Republicans who have spoken upon this bill—the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and others, the representatives of the old guard—propose to the country that the large additional sum of money that we must have on account of our preparedness program should not be raised by direct taxation, increases in the income tax, inheritance taxes, and so on; that it should not be raised by issuing any bonds, but that it should be raised by and through the customhouse. Now, the Payne-Aldrich bill averaged during its life, from the customs revenues, only about $320,000,000 per annum. If we are to get the additional money needed to finance the preparedness program through customs duties, we would have to double the tariff duties; they would have to be greatly increased or greatly expanded.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the Senator answers that question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield, and to whom?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to suggest to him—I have no doubt it has already suggested itself to his mind—that no one of us has ever argued that we ought to raise all the money from customs duties, but that we ought to raise more than we are raising under the law that is now on the statute books. Is not that our contention?

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. And to that extent we would save the necessity of direct taxes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I simply wanted to comment on the fact that the Senator from North Carolina has frequently lectured the Senate during the consideration of this bill for delaying action.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have never lectured the Senate in my life.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator himself is delaying the proceedings at this time, not for the purpose of enlightening the situation but for the purpose of gaining a political point. I want to call to his attention the fact that both the Progressive and the Republican platforms of 1912 stood for protection, and also that if the lowest Payne-Aldrich rates were now in force, based on our present importations, there would be an added revenue of $176,000,000 a year.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Republican revenue laws were in force to-day our revenues would be less than under the present law. The present law raises more than would the Republican laws they supersede.

Mr. SMOOT. Then how does the Senator figure——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The largest amount of revenue ever raised in this country in any one year was $734,000,000, under the present law in 1914. The Payne-Aldrich law, supplemented by the other revenues of the Government, never did yield in any year of our history that much money.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator made the statement just a moment ago that in order to raise the amount necessary to pay the running expenses of the Government we would have to double the rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Or expand them.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, he simply makes the statement that if the Payne-Aldrich rates were in force, the present bill would raise more money. Mr. President, of course that will not deceive anybody in the United States. The income tax and all of the other taxes that were put on, of course, raised more than the Payne-Aldrich bill; but I say now to the Senate that, taking the importations for the fiscal year 1916, the customs tax collected was $211,000,000, and the average rate was 9.72 per cent. The average rate of the Payne-Aldrich bill was 18.8 per cent; and if the importations were the same this year as they were for 1916, there would be a gain of $183,000,000 in customs receipts.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am probably as responsible for the differences of opinion which arose some years ago among members of the Republican Party with respect to the tariff as any one man. I am not willing to allow the Senator from North Carolina to define the economic faith of progressive Republicans. I fear he does not understand the subject, at least from their point of view; and if the Senator from North Dakota will permit me, I want to correct to a degree the opinions which are evidently entertained by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me? I have not expressed any opinion of my own. I was trying to get the opinion of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is nothing more common in the Senate than to express an opinion through the form of an inquiry or a question.

Mr. GRONNA. Before the Senator from Iowa answers that I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I have not as yet had the opportunity of answering the Senator; but I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that the Senator from North Dakota has been rather excluded from the controversy by the insistence of other Senators. If he will permit me——

Mr. GRONNA. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. The progressive Republicans, so called—and I was one of them—believed sincerely that there were many duties in the Dingley tariff law which were too high, higher than necessary to completely protect domestic producers from unfair competition arising in other countries, and the struggle began with that assertion. These Republicans believed that the law which was substituted for the Dingley tariff law in 1909 contained many duties that were higher than necessary to embody the doctrine of protection as declared in Republican platforms, and some of us voted against the Payne-Aldrich tariff law of 1909. I was one of the Senators who so voted.

But the Senator from North Carolina is wholly mistaken when he assumes that the revenue derived from a tariff law depends entirely upon the duties which may be imposed. He is endeavoring now to put the progressive Republicans in the position of saying that the present law is adequate, because if a law were substituted like the Payne-Aldrich law one hundred millions more would be derived from the customhouses, and, therefore, that we ought not to object to the present tariff law.

The existing statute is more objectionable to the progressive view than any Republican tariff law that was ever passed. It is easy to raise the duties so that there will be no revenue at all, and yet the Senator from North Carolina seems to incline to the opinion that the higher the duties the more the revenue. That is only true of those things which we do not produce ourselves and must import. The tariff law for which I stand would present duties which would raise, in my opinion, $100,000,000 more at the customhouses than is raised by the present tariff law, and yet would contain no duty so high that fair competition was not possible under it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. CUMMINS. If we have a fair tariff law which accurately equalizes the difference between the cost of producing things abroad and the cost of producing things here, we will have adequate protection and at the same time we will raise the maximum revenue.

I thought I ought to say this, because the question—not any answer that the Senator from North Dakota has made, because he has had no opportunity to make any—but the question seemed to imply that progressive Republicans were in favor of a tariff law that would produce less revenue than the Payne-Aldrich bill. It is mere speculation, but as my views are formulated in my own mind I am not in favor of any such law. I believe in raising at the customhouses every dollar of revenue possible by attaching to competitive commodities duties that will fairly represent the difference between the cost of manufacturing or producing them abroad and here, coupled with the further condition that the duties, in the case of competitive commodities, must admit the domestic producer to the markets of his own country and enable him to do business there with fair opportunity for success.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my view with regard to the tariff, and I did not want any misapprehension to arise about it. I supplement what the Senator from North Dakota has said. I should like to bury these differences at the present time; but, inasmuch as they will arise, I must record my opinion to the effect that if the Republicans had followed the suggestions of the progressive Republicans in composing the tariff law of 1909 our Democratic friends would still be languishing in obscurity and in the minority. I hope that when the Republicans do come to make up a tariff law—and I think that opportunity will present itself before long—the general rule which I have suggested will prevail, for we have all come to know each other better and we are more persuaded of the mutual desire to construct a tariff law that will accomplish the real purpose of the Republican doctrine, and accomplish no more.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him now, with the consent of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GRONNA. I have only a very little more to say, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that I think I very thoroughly understand the Senator's views upon the tariff. He very fully and elaborately discussed them several years ago when we were considering this question, pending the consideration of the present tariff act. I did not understand that he differed very materially from such Senators as the late lamented Senator Dolliver. He made it clear then, as he does now, that he was a protectionist, but he protested against the abuses of protection as exemplified in the Payne-Aldrich bill. He was a protectionist, but he was opposed to some of the high and some of the prohibitive rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill. I understood that to be the position of the Progressive Party.

Mr. President, the Senator certainly knows that I am as well aware as he is that you can make a tariff rate so high that it becomes prohibitory and no revenue will accrue to the Government from it. I think that was true of many of the duties of the Payne-Aldrich law.

What I meant a little while ago in my question was this: The Progressives protested against the high rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill. Now we are confronted with an extraordinary situation. We have got to raise about $360,000,000 for preparedness purposes. The Republicans say it should not be raised by direct taxes, excise taxes, internal-revenue taxes, that no part of it should be raised by the issue of bonds, but all of it should be raised at the customhouse through tariff impositions.

Now, I said, and I want to repeat, that the Payne-Aldrich law in its best year only yielded $333,000,000. The average yield was only $320,000,000. We only realized about just enough money to pay expenses, with a little surplus sometimes, with a little deficit sometimes. How would you raise the additional $360,000,000 through the customhouse without increasing customs taxes enormously?

Mr. CUMMINS. I answered that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I tried to interrupt the Senator, and he would not yield. So let me finish. I understand the Senator from Iowa says that we will raise it from the customhouse, not by increasing the Payne-Aldrich rates, that he is opposed to, but by reducing the Payne-Aldrich rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would reduce some of them; not all. Some of the rates of the Payne-Aldrich law are perfectly just from the Republican standpoint; but I believe——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator did not let me finish my sentence before he interrupted me. I did not do the Senator that way. The Senator said he would raise it through customs tariffs, not by increasing the Payne-Aldrich rates, but by reducing the Payne-Aldrich rates. Then, wherein does the Senator differ from us? We have reduced those rates, but have not received as much revenue as we expected because of the great curtailment of dutiable imports on account of the war. We may have to reduce them lower than the Senator would have reduced them, but it was our purpose, first, to get revenue, and, next, to do justice to the consumers of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no Republican of whom I know who believes that a tariff law could be rewritten which would increase the revenue over the present revenue in the sum of $360,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly.

Mr. CUMMINS. But there are Republicans, and I am one of them, who believe that a tariff law could be written which during the course of the next year would raise $100,000,000 or $125,000,000 more than the Democratic law will raise without imposing any duty which is excessive as tested by the Republican standard, namely, a duty which will give to American producers a fair chance to enter their own markets——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. And do business there successfully.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will just pardon me one moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has addressed the Chair. Does he yield further?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what I have been trying to get at. We have to raise $360,000,000 more money by reason of preparedness. Now, the Senator says that you could not through the customhouse raise more than $100,000,000 of that money. The Republican Party are denouncing us for proposing to raise a part of this money by direct taxation.

I want to ask the Senator this question, and that is the gravamen of my purpose in making this interruption. I have the Senator's statement now that he does not believe that by a proper revision of the Payne-Aldrich rates more than $100,000,000 additional could be raised. The amount of customs revenue raised through the Payne-Aldrich law in 1913 was $318,000,000. That would still leave two hundred and sixty-odd million dollars to be raised. The Senator did not indicate how he would raise that money. I want the Senator, if he is not going to raise that additional $260,000,000 through the customhouse, to indicate what is his plan. What would be his scheme if he could write the law to raise that additional $264,000,000?

Mr. CUMMINS. The first thing I would hav done——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The first thing I would have done would have been to have omitted appropriations to the extent of $100,000,000 or $200,000,000, and then there would not have been so great a deficiency to provide for. But I say frankly I have no expectation in the immediate future of a tariff law that will raise more than $325,000,000 or $350,000,000 at the customhouse; and if, with a Government economically and prudently administered, the revenues at the customhouses are not sufficient, then I am in favor of raising the remainder through an income tax——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Or an increase in the income tax.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further?

Mr. GRONNA. I shall conclude in a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield further.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President I did not rise for the purpose of entering into a general discussion of the tariff. I propose to-morrow to make some observations on the pending revenue bill, and will then discuss the tariff. But since the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has raised the issue, I will say to him that, in the first place, I would not have burdened the American people with $600,000,000 of taxes that they will have to pay under your administration, because the amount which you appropriated for the year 1917 will total more than $1,700,000,000. If I had something to say about how this Government should be run, I would have kept expenses down and I would have kept appropriations down to about the same as you had them last year, $1,115,000,000. That will be increased this year more than $600,000,000.

The Senator from North Carolina asked me how I would increase the revenue above that of the Payne-Aldrich law. I will say to him I would levy a duty on hides and all other agricultural products. The Democratic Party, with the aid of the stand-pat Republicans, if they will pardon me for the expression, said to us, and told the farmers who are interested in the question of hides, "If you will place hides on the free list we will sell you shoes at 50 cents a pair cheaper." What was the result? The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] knows, and every Senator here knows, that shoes have advanced ever since, and that never in American history have shoes sold as high as they do to-day. The price of hides went down to the farmer, the manufactured product increased, the leather increased in price, and, as every intelligent citizen of the country knows, the price of shoes has continually been increasing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just a word. The Senator from North Dakota is always fair. The Senator should exempt the stand-pat Republican from New Hampshire in the matter of hides.

Mr. GRONNA. I did not mean to include the Senator from New Hampshire with respect to the tariff, because he really is becoming a Progressive.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand that the Democrats placed hides on the free list——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have had recognition. I simply wanted to say, as the Senator already knows, that I fought with as much zeal against removing the duty from hides as I did against the foolish reciprocity agreement that was proposed.

Mr. GRONNA. That is absolutely true, and I am sorry I did not make myself understood and make my statement more specific. But the Senator from New Hampshire knows that some of the leading Republicans of the manufacturing districts were responsible for the plan of free hides in a Republican tariff bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and they did a very foolish thing.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GRONNA. Just in a moment I will yield. I want to answer the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, asked me the question how I would raise sufficient revenue by a customs tariff. I say to the Senator from North Carolina that if the so-called Progressive Republicans could have had their say in writing the Payne-Aldrich tariff law the duties would have been lowered on some things and they would have been restored on some of the articles that were placed on the free list.

I am going to try to show to the Senator from North Carolina to-morrow, if he will honor me with his presence, that under such a rate, based upon the importations this year, we would have raised three hundred and eighty-odd million dollars of customs taxes, which is more than $170,000,000 above what you are raising under your present tariff law. The Senator from North Carolina knows that every article produced on the farm was placed on the free list in your law. The Senator from North Carolina, who is chairman of the committee, knows that there is not a single item of farm product that is protected in your free-trade law. It is not a free-trade law in manufactured goods. You have protected some of your industries and your own industries, but you failed to protect ours.

Mr. President, I have occupied the time of the Senate far longer than I intended. I simply rose for the purpose of calling to the attention of my good friend, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] the fact that he was mistaken in assuming, if he did assume, that the revolt in the House of Representatives was due to a tariff question. It was due, as we believed, to unfair treatment by those who at that time were in control of the Republican Party; and, as one who participated in that revolt, I have never felt sorry nor felt ashamed of my action.

Mr. WEEKS obtained the floor.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. OWEN. I ask the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts to present a conference report on House bill 13391, to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, by adding a new section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield for that purpose?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. OWEN. I want to call the attention of the Senate to an error in the print where section 13 is described. The words—except by authority of the Federal Reserve Board, under such general regulations as said board may prescribe, but not to exceed the capital stock and surplus of such bank, and such regulations shall apply to all banks alike regardless of the amount of capital stock and surplus—should be stricken out; they were stricken out in section 14. The omission was not observed until the print came in.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. OWEN. I call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the first part of the report in which there was inserted a clause relating to reserves which he opposed and which the Senate struck out.

Mr. GRONNA. I wanted to ask the Senator, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. WEEKS. Very well.

Mr. GRONNA. By what authority the committee of conference has reinserted the provision relating to section 19. If the Senator from Oklahoma will take the RECORD and follow the debate on this floor, he will see that he agreed to eliminate the section, the part relating to section 19, which provided that all the reserves of a bank may be taken out and deposited in some Federal reserve bank?

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator from North Dakota will permit me, the amendment to the House bill was one amendment which in being perfected on the floor of the Senate was objected to in this item by the Senator, but the House of Representatives through their conferees insisted upon restoring it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator knows that there was no such provision at all in the bill when it came from the House.

Mr. OWEN. Certainly not. There was no part——

Mr. GRONNA. It was not in the bill when it passed this body, but your conference committee inserted something which was never in the bill.

Mr. OWEN. The House of Representatives through their members had a right to amend the Senate amendment as a matter of parliamentary propriety and as a matter of parliamentary right. The Senator evidently thinks this matter is a bill which had passed both Houses where there were only particular differences to be considered. He would be right in his criticism if that were true.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator——

Mr. OWEN. Just a moment. But in this case the House provision was stricken out, the Senate provision was put in, and the House demands the amendment to the Senate amendment. That is all there is about it.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator what difference it made whether the House provision was stricken out or the Senate provision was stricken out, so long as the provision was not placed in the bill by either House?

Mr. OWEN. I call the attention of the Senator again to the parliamentary fact that the Senate amendment to the House bill was one amendment, including a number of sections, and that the House of Representatives had a right to perfect that by demanding changes in it. I am speaking of the parliamentary right now of the House conferees. They exercised that right and made the demand.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I wish to be heard on that, but I do not wish to take the Senator from Massachusetts from the floor now.

Mr. OWEN. The conference report is before the Senate now. If the Senator wants to be heard, I take it he will address himself to that question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the Senator simply offering the conference report now?

Mr. OWEN. I ask for the adoption of the conference report now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no motion made to take up the conference report.

Mr. GRONNA. I object to taking it up.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Oklahoma asks that the report be taken up?

Mr. OWEN. I did not move to take it up. I only asked that it be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota objects to unanimous consent to taking up the report. It can not be taken up without a motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would be willing, if the Senator from Oklahoma desires, to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business that the conference report may be acted on.

Mr. OWEN. I would have brought this matter up yesterday, but the Senator from North Dakota was not present, and because of that the matter was postponed until to-day to give him an opportunity to be present. These conference reports have got to be disposed of, and this report may as well be disposed of now as at another time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. GRONNA. I shall have to object at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota objects.

Mr. OWEN. I move that the report be taken up.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I understand the matter before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts yielded to the Senator from Oklahoma to make a request for unanimous consent to present the conference report, and that was objected to by the Senator from North Dakota. So the Senator from Massachusetts still has the floor. If he yields to the Senator from Oklahoma for the purpose of a motion, of course the motion will be entertained.

Mr. WEEKS. I think as long as the conference report is likely to be debated to a considerable extent, based on what I hear about me, it would be better to take it up at another time.

Mr. OWEN. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the House of Representatives will not meet again until next Tuesday. It is in session to-day.

Mr. WEEKS. Personally, I do not want to object to the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Oklahoma is in error about the House not meeting until next Tuesday.

Mr. OWEN. I was so told.

Mr. SIMMONS. My understanding is that this is a privileged motion and that its adoption would not displace the unfinished business except so long as it is necessary to dispose of the conference report.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is quite wrong about that. It is not a privileged motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I rose for the purpose of having the decision of the Chair upon that question, because I was advised by a distinguished parliamentarian that it is privileged.

Mr. SMOOT. To consider a conference report is not a privileged motion. The presentation of a conference report is privileged.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wish the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling of the Chair is that the reception of the report is a privileged matter, but the adoption of the report is not.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. OWEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill 13391.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hughes	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Borah	Husting	O'Gorman	Smoot
Bryan	Jones	Oliver	Sterling
Chilton	Kenyon	Overman	Stone
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Owen	Taggart
Colt	Lea, Tenn.	Penrose	Thomas
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Pittman	Thompson
Curtis	Lippitt	Reed	Warren
Dillingham	McCumber	Shafroth	Weeks
Fletcher	McLean	Sheppard	Williams
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I was requested to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] are absent on official business.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, has the roll been called a second time for absentees?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not yet been called a second time. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. HARDING, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. UNDERWOOD answered to their names when called.

Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. BECKHAM, and Mr. SAULSBURY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13391) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, by adding a new section.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, while I am well within my rights in asking for this action, and while under Rule XXVII a conference report when presented as a privileged matter has the right to immediate disposition without debate, because of the sentiment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] I am willing to withdraw my request and to let the matter go over until to-morrow. I give notice, however, that to-morrow I shall demand the disposition of this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the motion is withdrawn.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may, at some future day, have printed in the RECORD the following titles of speeches, which I have heretofore delivered in the Senate on the tariff question, including my remarks of to-day, with subheads from the context and with an appropriate index. The titles I propose are as follows:

"American tariffs from Plymouth Rock to McKinley and Dingley."

"Prosperity is the issue."

"Protection is panic proof."

"Protection has vindicated itself."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, an editorial from the Washington Post of August 23, 1916, relative to the financial condition of the country. The editorial is short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FORGING AHEAD.

When steel common made its high record of 95 recently it topped the previous peak of 1909 by an eighth of a point. The high point reached in 1909 followed a bitter competition in which prices were cut and wages were lowered. The war in the steel industry sent the price of the stock down to 41½. The recovery was one of the most sensational ever observed in the stock market. Whereas the net earnings of the company for the first quarter of 1909 were a little over $22,000,000, the earnings for the final quarter nearly reached $41,000,000.

The rise of the present year has been equally sensational. In February of 1915 the stock had dropped to 38. There had been a recovery of 57 points when the high record of 95 was reached.

As against the net earnings for 1909, amounting to more than $131,000,000, the net earnings of 1916 are estimated at $312,000,000. There could be no better evidence of the firm foundation on which the prosperity of the country rests. The United States Steel Corporation is not engaged in manufacturing munitions of war. Its business responds to the demand for railroad extensions, the construction of steel bridges, and the need for new buildings. The enormous prosperity of the company is an indication that the country is forging ahead steadily, with abundant prosperity in sight.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to have printed in the RECORD speeches previously made by him on the tariff encourages me to ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD at some future time my remarks on the tariff delivered on June 15, 1909.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if a political party were to be given credit for the volume of legislation for which it is responsible, I am sure that the present administration would stand high in the records of our past administration; but if it were to be charged with the character of the legislation for which it is responsible, I am confident that it would take a very low place in those records. It is true that a vast amount of legislation has been passed. Many of the bills to which I am going to make reference I have opposed, because I thought they were illogical, unsound, and unwise; but I do not recall any one of them that, from the standpoint of a correct public policy, seems to me to be so unwise and undesirable as the bill which is now pending before the Senate.

Something has been said here to-day about protection and about some differences which may exist between Republicans on that subject. Of course, there are differences between Republicans as to the rates of duty which shall be imposed on some particular articles. It would not be human that that condition should be different. We represent different sections of the country; we represent, to some degree, different interests. We are here especially charged with the care of things which are transpiring in our immediate vicinity. We may, therefore, very naturally take a different view of something with which we are very familiar from the view taken by Senators who live at a distance. There is no difference, however, among Republican Senators on the question of the protective policy. We all believe in protection, and there is where we differ from Senators sitting on the other side of the aisle.

They have broken down protection, and will continue to do it at every opportunity. It is the policy which this bill represents that I think is so unwise from a public standpoint that I want to take time to discuss it. At the expense of some repetition I wish to insert a few figures in the RECORD relating to the needs for this legislation at this time.

There are two reasons for it. One is that we have been making unusual preparations for war or defense; another is that this administration, notwithstanding its party pledges—and I want once more to insert in the RECORD the party platform on that subject—notwithstanding its pledges has been more extravagant than has any administration which has controlled our Government.

We appropriated for war purposes in the appropriation bills of 1916 $257,696,000; we have appropriated for military needs this year in all of the bills that we have thus far considered $606,644,000, or $348,000,000 more than we did in 1916; it is estimated that the deficiency bills will carry about $40,000,000 more; so that substantially $390,000,000 will be appropriated this year for war purposes more than was appropriated last year. That is one reason for this large additional appropriation, but our total appropriations for this year will exceed $1,700,000,000; just how much can not at this time be determined. The total appropriations for the year 1916 were $1,114,000,000, so that this year they will be approximately $585,000,000 greater than they were in 1916.

As the war appropriations cover, as I figure them, $389,000,000, it leaves an excess over 1916 for other than war purposes of $196,113,000. As a further comparison which may be of some interest I want to suggest that the appropriations with which those of 1916 are being compared exceeded by something like $177,000,000 those which were made in the last Republican Congress. The reasons why we have not revenues enough for these purposes are that the appropriations are greater and the returns at the customhouses are less than ever before.

We had a panic following the Wilson tariff law of 1895, when the average rates of duty were 22 per cent, which resulted from those rates, very largely. The average rate for the fiscal year 1916 has been 9.6 per cent.

The President and others connected with his party have frequently said that the reason we have not revenue enough is because of the falling off of importations due to the European war; but, as a matter of fact, the importations for 1916 have increased more than $500,000,000 over those of 1915, and are more than $300,000,000 greater than they have ever been in the history of the country. The trouble is that the average rate of duty which these importations bear at the customhouse is 3 per cent less than it was in 1915, and is 8 per cent less than it was at the lowest rate imposed during the life of the Payne-Aldrich bill; in other words, if we added that 8 per cent to the importations that came in last year we should have produced a revenue of $176,000,000, more than the revenue which the importations actually produced; and that $176,000,000 added to the more than $200,000,000, which has been appropriated for purposes outside of the ordinary activities of the Government, would almost exactly offset this $889,000,000 which we must raise for war purposes; in other words, we would have had revenue enough if the Democratic Party had not appropriated money for various unusual purposes which I will enumerate, and had it left the rates of duty as high as the lowest rate of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. President, I ask permission to put into the RECORD a table of the importations from the year 1910 to the year 1916, the duties collected as a result of those importations, and the average rates for each year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). The Chair hearing no objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Importations, duties collected, and average rate of duty on all imports, by fiscal years.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in a speech made the day before yesterday used this expression:

> Among the great principles that have come down to us from the days of a Jefferson, a Madison, and a Jackson is the principle that in equality of taxation there is justice; that in the abuse of the taxing power of the Government there can only result injustice and oppression to the men and women of America.

Instead of raising this money in a just way, in a fair way, I insist that the bill which is now before the Senate is unfair; it is unjust to individuals; it is unjust to localities; it is a measure prepared for the purpose of getting as much revenue as possible and to affect as few people as possible. Why did not the Democratic House and the Democratic Senate or the Democratic caucus adopt the suggestion of the President, made at the beginning of the year, that we impose a tax on gasoline or that we impose a tax on automobiles? The Democratic caucus did not do that because there are millions of people in the United States running automobiles and millions of people using gasoline, and it did not want to affect the votes of the users of those articles. Instead of that they raised the tax on incomes, as it has been done, because they know that it will affect comparatively few people.

The tendency to which I have referred of the Democratic Party in legislation to pass bills which relate to subjects outside of the usual activities of government is one which is largely responsible for the present condition of the Treasury. For example, we have appropriated $5,000,000, and that amount has been set aside, to establish a war-risk insurance company. We have appropriated $30,000,000 for the purpose of building a railroad in Alaska. We are so anxious to tax the rich that we are proposing to spend $20,000,000 for a nitrate plant; we have appropriated $11,000,000 for an armor-plate factory, and we know perfectly well that if the armor plant is to be large enough to carry out the purposes which its sponsors hope it will cost substantially twice that amount.

A bill appropriating $50,000,000 for flood protection is now pending—a new object of governmental expenditure—and a $50,000,000 appropriation has been made for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of the shipping bill. All told, taking the extraordinary appropriations of this character which have been made by this Congress, they aggregate something like $266,000,000, which again substantiates the statement I have made that if the revenue which could have been derived from the rates imposed under the Payne-Aldrich Act were added to the amount obtained at the customhouses last year, and that total were added to the present extraordinary appropriations to which I have referred, the total would amount to more than the appropriations for war purposes made this year in excess of those made for the year ending June 30, 1916.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I am sure the Senator intends to be entirely fair in his statement, particularly with regard to the items of appropriation. I desire to remind the Senator that the appropriation for the Alaska Railroad was not made by the present Congress, as the Senator has intimated, but by the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. WEEKS. I understand that part of the appropriation was made in one Congress and part in the other.

Mr. THOMAS. The authorization for the total amount was made in the previous Congress.

Mr. WEEKS. I am much obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to that, because I, of course, do not wish to make any misstatement in regard to it.

Mr. THOMAS. I am satisfied the Senator did not intend to do so.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, in adopting the course which the Democratic Party has taken in framing this bill, it seems to me that it has entirely changed its party policy; it has become a socialistic party instead of a Democratic Party. A few days ago I happened to be reading an address made by a distinguished leader of the Democratic Party some 30 years ago, a man who was thought by many members of his party as a suitable presidential candidate, a man who adorned both the Senate and our Diplomatic Service, and I could not help note the difference between the activities of the old Democratic Party as represented by the views which Thomas F. Bayard expressed as the correct policy for the Government to follow and the course which that party has pursued in recent years. Let me read briefly from this address to which I have referred. He said:

> All tendencies of legislation which, ignoring individual responsibility, substitute governmental control in matters social and personal, weaken the powers of the individual and, enfeebling them by disuse, lessen their agency in the good government of himself and his family. In this mischievous substitution of governmental power in matters social and personal lies the objection to sumptuary laws, interference with conscience in social and religious affairs, the invasion of the domain of private opinion and personal liberty, which seeks to impose penalties for anticipated acts and offenses as yet uncommitted. * * *
> It is, in fact, the principle of socialism, of communism, of paternal oversight of the Government substituted for individual endeavor, guided by intelligent self-interest and restrained by individual conscience.
> It is to promote the healthy sentiment and habit of self-reliant manhood that the Democratic Party throughout the United States insists upon the fullest degree of individual liberty of conscience and action consistent with public safety and the rights of others; and for that reason we deprecate all unnecessary interference with the rights of local self-government, and all class legislation by the General Government which assumes guardianship and protection over the business of the private citizen, and functions of control over matters of domestic and local interest.

Compare that statement with what has been done by the Democratic Party during this administration. But if that were not enough to condemn it, let me quote a present-day leading Democrat, the present occupant of the White House on that particular subject. He said in an article in the American Review two months after the conclusion of President Roosevelt's term of service:

> Government control, which we are undertaking so extensively and with so light a heart, sets up, not a reign of law, but a reign of discretion and individual judgment on the part of Government officials in the regulation of the business of stock companies owned by innumerable private individuals and supplying the chief investments of thousands of communities. I can see no radical difference between governmental ownership and governmental regulation of this discretionary kind. There is no logical stopping place between that and the actual conduct of business enterprises by the Government. Such methods of regulation, it may be safely predicted, will sooner or later be completely discredited by experience.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to ask the Senator the name of the author of the little extract which the Senator has read?

Mr. WEEKS. The last extract is from the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Now, may I ask who was the author of the first quotation the Senator read?

Mr. WEEKS. The speech from which I first read a paragraph or two was made by Thomas F. Bayard in 1882. What I am trying to point out is that the Democratic Party as at present constituted has entirely departed from the spirit and the principles which governed the fathers of that party and which have governed the leaders of that party down to the present administration; it is for that among other reasons that we are now faced with the necessity for these large and unusual appropriations, made not according to the principles of democracy or republicanism, but of socialism, pure and simple.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. May I not ask is it not the view of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Republican Party also has wandered from its moorings since the days of Abraham Lincoln?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, we occasionally wander, but we get back very quickly when we find that we are wrong. The Democratic Party keeps on wandering until it has gotten so far in the wilderness that I fear it will never get back.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the Republican Party are many, many leagues from the foundations builded by the immortal Lincoln.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who, from the important position he has occupied in connection with fiscal legislation, is justly considered one of the leaders of his party, in the speech to which I have referred, made day before yesterday, stated that this bill is an ideal Democratic measure and fully carries out the Democratic principles of taxation. Which bill did he mean, the House bill, which relieved the country from $45,000,000 additional stamp taxes, or the Senate bill, which includes them; the House bill, which put a surtax of 100 per cent upon the existing minimum income tax—that is, doubled the normal taxes of 1 per cent and raised the rate on larger incomes—or the Senate bill, which increased the higher rates to 13 per cent; or did he mean the Senate bill, which reduced the exemptions from four thousand to three thousand dollars and three thousand to two thousand dollars, or the caucus bill, which put the exemptions back to the limit in the present law?

Incidentally I want to say, Mr. President, that I see no objection to the principle of an income tax, but I have opposed the Government levying an income tax at any other time than during a period of great emergency. The income tax now proposed, however, is absolutely unfair. If the tax applied to incomes down to and including $1,000, it would affect hundreds of thousands and millions of citizens who now bear no part in supporting the Government under such measures of taxation as this bill provides. It would be better for the Government, it would be better for our revenues, it would be better for the individuals themselves, if the law were made to apply to all incomes from $1,000 up. The reason the law is not so applied is perfectly apparent. It is not the purpose of the Democratic Party to embarrass any more citizens than possible. Therefore it imposes such a tax as one of 13 per cent on incomes of more than $2,000,000. I do not expect to excite any sympathy in the minds of anyone for the man who has an income of $2,000,000, even if 13 per cent of it is taken; but if it is logical to take 13 per cent, why is it not logical to take 26 per cent or 52 per cent or 75 per cent? He would have enough left for any of the needs of any possible family. If any of the taxes which are imposed in this bill relating to incomes are logical, then it is just as logical and just as easy to double them. We are doubling them now over what they were in the law which is now on the statute books; and next year, if we happen to want more money, we will double them again. But we will be pretty sure not to impose this tax on the great body of citizens, because that would affect the possibilities of reelecting those who have a voice in so doing.

There is no logic in this method of taxation. I heard a distinguished leader of the House of Representatives during my service there, when asked what limit he would place on taxing the income of an individual, said, "Well, if a man had a hundred thousand dollars income, I would take a quarter of it for the Government. Yes," he said, "I would take half of it; and, even then, the individual would have enough left to maintain himself." Mr. President, that is not taxation; that is confiscation; and this bill is partial confiscation as it is now framed.

When you take 13 per cent of any man's income and apply it to the expenses of the Government, taxing another man 5 per cent, another man 2 per cent, and another man nothing, there is no logic in it; there is no soundness in it; it is unfair and unsafe. As I have said, I do not expect to excite any sympathy for the individuals with very large incomes, and I have no particular desire to do so, but they are citizens of the Republic and they are entitled to fair treatment by those who are sent here to represent them.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, would the Senator object to an interruption on that point?

Mr. WEEKS. Not at all.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator might also refer to the fact that these people all pay State and local taxes, which pyramid the burden. A gentleman very well known to the Senator—I do not know that he is a man of very great means, though he is well off—informed me yesterday that he figured out that his total personal taxes were 33 per cent of his income, counting his State, city, and Federal taxes.

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly that is true. I know, Mr. President, that in the State of Massachusetts the tax for State, county, and municipal purposes is $26 per capita. The tax which we impose under the law which is now on the statute books for governmental purposes is less than $8 per capita. In other words, these individuals are paying more than three times as much in the State of Massachusetts for local purposes than they are asked to pay for governmental purposes under this unfair legislation.

Mr. PENROSE. And even in the midst of this great war in Europe I am informed that the personal taxes abroad do not much exceed 25 per cent of the incomes, so that under this law we will be the most heavily taxed Nation in the world.

Mr. WEEKS. Now to return to the particular phase of the bill which I was discussing. Did the Senator from Alabama mean the House provision which placed a discriminatory and extremely burdensome tax on copper as a profitable war industry, or the Senate bill which completely makes over that schedule and simply taxes the part that goes into military uses?

Did he mean the House bill, which does not tax steel, alcohol, cotton, and other similar articles used in the manufacture of war materials, or the Senate bill, which puts a tax on all such products? Did he mean the House bill, which placed no tax on the profits of a business selling munitions abroad or the Senate bill, which provides for such a tax? And, incidentally, to my mind—which is not a legal one—such a tax comes pretty near the verge of being unconstitutional, for it is very close to the dividing line of placing a duty on exports. Did he mean that it was a principle of the Democratic Party to place the Government in the position of being a beneficiary of the plunder obtained in making war materials to be used in slaughtering human beings? For the tax on munitions presupposes large profits and also presupposes large sales, and therefore our Government, which is attempting to maintain a neutral position, is, in effect, in direct partnership with every munition maker who is selling his products abroad, and the money obtained from this tax is to be used in providing for our own preparedness measures. Hence, there is a direct connecting link between the destruction of human lives in Europe and every vessel we are to construct for our Navy as a result of this legislation.

Did Mr. UNDERWOOD mean that a tariff on dyes is a Democratic measure; and if so, how long has it been the policy of the Democratic Party to place a duty on a product for the purpose of building up or protecting an industry? Naturally, putting this law into effect is postponed until peace, because there is now a prohibitive duty on dyes due to the blockade. Is it a Democratic measure to prevent a citizen of the United States from buying a bargain abroad at as low a price as possible, and is it a Democratic policy to put into the hands of the President the power to retaliate for any unfair discriminations levied upon goods from this country by after-the-war economic alliances?

And so I might go through the whole bill. It may be Democratic policy, but to a thoughtful investigator it is in reality a bill attempting to collect revenue from sources from which it can be obtained and affect as few voters in so doing as possible. If it is logic to levy an income tax as it was levied in last year's bill, it is equally logical to double that tax and very materially increase surtaxes. If a tax of 13 per cent is to be levied on incomes of over $2,000,000, why not levy a tax of 26 per cent on such incomes or 52 per cent or 78 per cent? That would leave the owner of the income a sufficient amount on which to live. It strikes me that this policy is simply one of expediency, and that the Democratic Party has lost such character as it had as an organization having principles and has become purely socialistic in matters of this kind.

It is hardly worth while to criticize this bill as discriminating between classes of citizens and sections of the country, for it was evidently the intention of the framers of the bill that it should be so. Neither is it worth while to criticize the bill because it has not been amended in the respects in which the country has found taxes unnecessarily burdensome. Neither is it worth while to criticize it because it imposes a tax on the last one of those sources of income which should be reserved to the State, namely, the inheritance tax. There is no objection to an inheritance tax, but there is vital objection to doubling and tripling taxes on such sources of revenue. Many States have income taxes and inheritance taxes. Local demands for all kinds of developments and improvements are rapidly increasing, and the income and inheritance taxes are two of the sources of revenue which should either be collected by the State and a percentage turned over to the National Government, or, better, should not be imposed at all by the National Government in time of peace.

This whole bill from its inception has been vacillating in its purposes, and, I am frank to say, unskillful in its execution. Neither House agrees with the President in his suggestions, one of which was a tax on gasoline and automobiles—a tax which would certainly be productive of revenue and of much more permanence than a tax on ammunition, which necessarily must end with the war—but that affected millions of voters and the prudent Democracy which hopes to win an election by deceiving the people can not stand for it, although it was recommended by its own leader.

The Federal income tax, authority for which was given by amending the Constitution, was supposed to be used as an emergency tax; yet it has been deliberately levied in time of peace, is now being doubled in a time of unprecedented, even if it is a mushroom, prosperity, and this occurs at a time when many States have found it necessary to impose such a tax. Massachusetts has recently passed a law levying an income tax. The Federal inheritance tax comes at a time when New York has added to the burdens of its inheritance tax.

I have been told that the inheritance tax as imposed by the State of New York under present conditions in some cases requires a payment of 8 per cent of the total inheritance to the State. Possibly the copper-producing States would have liked to have levied a tax on copper for their own purposes, but they naturally and very properly objected to a discrimination in the tax as proposed in the House bill.

I have suggested that this is class legislation, and to some degree that it was sectional legislation. I do not charge that it is sectional legislation with a purpose to make it sectional; but in its effect it does impose on certain States of the Union an unreasonable part of the burdens of taxation imposed in this way. I refer particularly to my own State, which has, to a considerable degree, it is true, accumulated wealth; and there is no disposition on the part of the people of that State to avoid their proper responsibility in taxation matters. Before I leave this subject, Mr. President, I should like to put in the RECORD, because I think it is of value under these conditions, the estimated true value of all property in the United States, being a part of the census reports, table 5, for 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEEKS. And also the revenues of all kinds obtained from the different States during the past year through ordinary, emergency, corporation, and personal income taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, they will be incorporated in the RECORD.

[1] Does not include $29,937.10 income tax on Alaska railroads.

Mr. WEEKS. When this matter came to my attention, as I was referring to the Senator from Alabama, I naturally looked at the taxes imposed on the State of Alabama and compared them with those imposed upon the State of Massachusetts. The total wealth of the State of Massachusetts in 1912 was $6,302,000,000. It pays an emergency tax of $3,610,000, a corporation income tax of $2,668,000, a personal income tax of $4,193,000, or a total in new forms of taxation of $10,471,000. That is a tax of $1 on every $625 of its wealth.

The State of Alabama—and Alabama is not peculiar in this respect; there are many other States in different parts of the country where the figures would not be very different—has a total wealth of $2,127,000,000, or something over one-third the total wealth of Massachusetts. It pays an emergency tax of $264,000, a corporation tax of $201,000, a personal income tax of $109,000, or a total tax for these three purposes of $576,000, which amounts to $1 of tax on every $3,700 of its wealth; or, Massachusetts pays six times as much per dollar of wealth.

I heard the Senator from Alabama say on the floor of the Senate last winter, when defending the Underwood-Simmons bill, that it was the deliberate purpose of the Democratic Party to tax wealth, or to make wealth pay its proportional part of the burdens of government. I do not think there is any great objection to that, but there is a vital objection to an unfair tax, wherever it is, or on whomever it may be imposed, and when $1 of tax is raised in Alabama on $3,700 of wealth and $1 of tax is raised in Massachusetts on $625 of wealth, that is unfair and unreasonable taxation. This law, whether intentionally or not, Mr. President, is so drawn that the few will be taxed and the many will escape; and it may be, as has been charged—I do not charge it—that it is drawn with a particular purpose to impose the burdens of government on a few States.

One of the most unreasonable and unwarrantable propositions in this bill, to my mind, is the attempt to prevent unfair competition. It proposes to punish an individual in the United States who buys goods abroad at a price that would prevent the same class of goods being produced in this country without loss to the producer. When the Underwood tariff bill was before the Senate I discussed at some length the proposition of selling abroad at lower prices than goods sold in this country by the same manufacturer or producer. Republicans have been criticized for advocating this course and manufacturers have been criticized for following it. I tried to demonstrate then, and I thought I did, that it was a wise business policy for us to encourage sales abroad, even if the sales were made at materially lower prices than the sales made to our own citizens.

What are the two elements that enter into manufacturing industries and the results which we hope to obtain? They are, first, to employ labor at as high prices as the industry can afford, and continuously, and, secondly, to employ capital in such a way that there will be a reasonable return on the investment. Unless there is a reasonable return, of course, capital will not go into manufacturing industries; and unless it can be employed reasonably continuously, and unless the wages conform to what can be obtained in other industries, labor will not become employed in that way.

Those are the two things which we are required to do. Now, it is impossible to find in the home market a market all of the time for all the products of our mills. There are times when we must go abroad to sell, and there are times when the foreign manufacturers must find a market elsewhere, because their total product is much greater than their local demands. One of the greatest values of the protective policy, in my judgment, is that while in times of abundance, when business is good abroad and in this country, it makes comparatively little difference whether we have a tariff or not; but when business is poor abroad and it is necessary to sell here a large part of the product of their manufacturing plants, the protective policy prevents those products from being dumped on us without our obtaining some recompense for it in the shape of the duties which are imposed.

The plan which is proposed in this bill for preventing the dumping of goods in the United States is unscientific and is unsound. I want to refer a little more in detail to some of the reasons why I think it is unsound.

Take, for example, a shoe manufacturer. It is generally agreed that when a factory is running three-fourths of its time the cost of manufacturing the average pair of shoes is 5 cents a pair greater than would be the cost if the plant were running at full capacity. If it were running one-half of the time, the cost of manufacturing the same shoes would be 10 cents a pair greater than it would be if the factory were running at its full capacity.

After a very careful investigation it has been developed that the average profit in ordinary times made on shoes manufactured in this country is about 7 cents a pair. Now, if a factory is running at full capacity and making 7 cents a pair on the shoes it produces, and it costs 5 cents more if it is only running at three-fourths of its capacity, of course under those conditions it only makes 2 cents a pair; and if it costs 10 cents a pair more if it is only running at half capacity, why, of course, on every pair of shoes it puts out under those conditions there is a loss of 3 cents.

What does that mean? It means that if the manufacturer runs his manufactory at full capacity and sells a part of his product at cost the workman is employed all of the time. It does not make any difference to the workman. But if the workman is employed only a portion of the time that not only directly reduces his income but it affects the prosperity of the community in which he lives. The average workman in a shoe manufactory in Massachusetts makes about $560 a year, if employed continuously. If the factory only runs three-quarters of the time, it reduces his income to $420 a year, or about that, and he has $140 a year less to spend. I think those figures are not quite accurate, but they are relatively so. In other words, it is important not only for the workman but it is important for the people in the community where he lives that such plants shall be run all the time, even if some of the goods sold do not bring a profit to the owners of the plant.

Now let me go on and give some further illustrations.

In the case of weaving worsted cloth—these are actual figures taken from the books of a manufacturing concern in Massachusetts—if the factory were running at three-fourths of its full capacity, the increased cost was 14.8 per cent. If it were running at one-half of its capacity, the increased cost was 36.7 per cent. If it were run at one-fourth its full capacity, the increased cost was 92 per cent. In other words, if we want to get the lowest possible cost in this country, whether we sell all of the goods here or not, or sell them all at a profit or not, we must run our plants at full capacity.

I will give one other illustration to demonstrate what this increased cost is when a factory is run at a portion of its full capacity.

In the case of cotton yarn the full-time production, of course, is 100 per cent; three-fourths time, increased cost 13.2 per cent; one-half time production, increased cost 40 per cent; one-fourth time production, increased cost 119 per cent.

Therefore it seems to me that it is demonstrated that it is absolutely for the interests of the community, for the interests of the workmen, and for the interests of economical production, that a plant should be run at full time. Now, if we can not sell all of our goods in our home markets, what are we going to do with the balance? We would sell them abroad at whatever price we can get.

I will return for an illustration to the shoe manufacturer. Let me take the case of a manufacturer who makes a profit of 8 cents a pair on his output if he runs his factory at full capacity. If he ran it at full capacity three-fourths of the time and shut down one-fourth of the time, his profit would be 3 cents a pair; but if he sold three-fourths of his output at full price and the balance, one-fourth, at cost, he would make 6 cents a pair on his output. Let us assume that he manufactures a million pairs of shoes a year when running at full capacity. He would make 8 cents a pair, or his profit for the year would be $80,000. If he ran at full capacity, but sold one-fourth of his product at cost, his profit would be $60,000. If he ran three-fourths of his time at full capacity and shut down his factory one-fourth of the time, his profit would be $22,500. In other words, he could afford to run his factory at its full capacity, selling one-fourth of his output at a loss of 15 cents a pair, and come out at the end of a year with the same net profit that he would have if he had run his factory three-fourths of the time at its full capacity and shut down for the remainder of the year.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that that demonstrates four propositions: That the community, the employee, the manufacturer, and the profits of the stockholders are all served well if a plant is run at its full capacity, even if a portion of the goods are sold somewhere at less than cost.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he has any figures relative to agricultural implements and their manufacture and their sale abroad?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have not any figures on that particular subject. My figures all refer to establishments manufacturing cottons, woolens, and shoes.

Mr. STERLING. I noted some criticism of manufacturers, and some criticism of the policy of protecting the manufacturers of such implements, because they were able to manufacture and sell abroad more cheaply than they were selling at home. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts would say that the same principle applies there as in the illustrations he has given?

Mr. WEEKS. Absolutely. If they employed workmen to manufacture those goods, those workmen have had that additional money to spend; it has been spent in the communities where they live; and the net returns to the stockholders in the manufacturing concerns are as large or larger than they would be if they shut down.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me to answer in part the inquiry made by the Senator from South Dakota.

It so happens that in a series of hearings which were held this year by a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, on an entirely different topic, nevertheless some attention was paid in the hearing to the question of the sale of agricultural machinery, particularly with respect to the exportation of agricultural machinery, and the prices received in foreign markets for machinery made by the great American manufacturers. The testimony before the subcommittee was to the effect that the agricultural machinery made in this country by the great corporations which are often alluded to has never been sold below cost abroad.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I now want to give one more example, and this example was taken from the books of a manufacturing concern in New England.

A cotton mill capitalized at a million and a half dollars, operating 135,000 spindles, running full time, produced 30,000,000 yards of colored cotton cloth during a six-months' period. The net earnings, based on actual results of this operation, were one-sixteenth of a cent a yard, or $20,700 for the six months. If this mill had been forced to curtail production by shutting down for one-fourth of the time, its production would have been reduced to 23,000,000 yards, which reduction, combined with the increased burden of fixed charges, would have changed the profit of one-sixteenth of a cent per yard into a loss of four-tenths of a cent per yard, or an actual loss of $93,600.

In other words, the manufacturer, by running his mill at full capacity, could have sold one-fourth of the mill's output at a loss of twenty-two one-hundredths of a cent per yard and come out without net loss for the six months.

I do not care to make any further comments on that particular subject, Mr. President; but it seems to me, as the bill is drawn, that it will be extremely difficult to operate, that it will be ineffective in its results, and that it will disappoint even those who believe it may have value, and I do not believe any such provision of law should be on the statute books, for the reasons which I have stated.

What are the conditions which are going to develop at the end of this war? It seems to me that this is the time when we should be making preparation, and permanent preparation, for the protection of our interests when the war prosperity has passed. We know that it is admitted on all hands that there is going to be a change in our industrial profits and in our industrial affairs at the end of the war. Even the Secretary of the Treasury in a recent statement used these words:

> With the restoration of peace in Europe customs duties collected under existing laws will greatly increase as the imports from countries now at war are gradually restored to a normal basis.

That means larger importations and less similar products manufactured at home. What we also know is that after the war we are going to have to deal with a people who are better disciplined than ever before. Millions of men are going to return to industrial employments who are now engaged in war, and they will do better work than they did before the war, because they are better disciplined. Moreover, as the result of the war great numbers of people have become employed in industrial pursuits who were not so employed before the war broke out.

This condition is also going to be affected by some action which has been taken in Europe already. One of these is what is known as the Paris economic pact, which has agreed to certain definite policies. This pact proposes (1) to devise joint means to secure to countries suffering from acts of destruction and spoliation of their raw materials, plants, and so forth, the restoration of the same, or to assist them to reequip themselves in these respects—that would mean Belgium; this agreement was entered into by the allied powers, by England, Russia, France, Belgium, and all others allied with them; (2) conservation for and interchange between the allied countries of their natural resources; (3) denial to the central powers, for a period to be fixed, of "most favored nation" treatment; (4) protection against "dumping" by the central powers. The foregoing are contained in the plans adopted for what is known as the reconstructive period. Under the heading of "Permanent measures of mutual assistance," the allies will take steps (1) to render themselves self-sufficient in regard to raw materials and manufactured articles essential to the normal development of their economic activities, which may include subsidies or Government direction and control, customs duties or prohibitions, or to combinations of these methods; (2) to facilitate and improve the interchange of their products; (3) to assimilate laws governing patents, trade-marks, and so forth, and for the adoption of an identical procedure in regard to same. Measures quite similar in character to those contained in the Paris pact have been agreed upon by the central powers.

It is worth noting that those nations which have agreed to the Paris pact invited Japan to become one of the parties to it, but the United States was not invited to become a party to it. In other words, there are going to be two great industrial alliances in Europe at the end of the war, and we are to have no part in either one of them; and probably, as ours will be the best market in the world, we are to be the natural prey of both.

It seems to me that instead of adopting this antidumping proposition, which I do not believe to be effective, we should be taking some permanent action which will give us suitable protection at the end of the war.

I wish to read an editorial from the New York Herald of August 16, which emphasizes this necessity. The New York Herald is far from being a protectionist organ. It has, I believe, very largely opposed the policy of protection. Yet this is what it says of the course which we should follow:

PROTECTION IS THE PREPAREDNESS THIS COUNTRY WILL MOST NEED SOON.

The Herald has been criticized severely for suggesting to Mr. Hughes, the Republican nominee for the Presidency, that he indicate to the public the type of man he would place in each important Cabinet place. It was said by the Republican press that the suggestion was made for the purpose of embarrassing Mr. Hughes. But the Democratic press saw the point according to its own lights and declared that it was proof that the Herald was a "Hughes paper."

It was merely a tentative hint to Mr. Hughes, more to test him than to tease him. The Herald now says that Mr. Hughes would be doing his cause more good if he stopped finding fault with relatively unimportant spoils grabbing by the Wilson administration and announced that the question of protection to American industries was a matter touching the very future life of the country. It would like to have him say that he would place in his Cabinet, to stand behind his economic policies, the most important and most successful business men to be found between the two oceans.

It is true that Mr. Hughes has proclaimed his fidelity to protection, but he has touched on that just as he has touched on many keys. He has not touched high C on the tariff. Those who prate of tariff commissions and treat the old doctrine of straight-out protection as something unfashionable have no comprehension of the situation which this country must confront at the termination of the war. These persons Mr. Hughes must educate.

Are not the signs of the times enough to convince doubters that there will be no time for a tariff commission to mess and muddle over a situation which will require immediate statecraft? Our present tariff schedules will be no protection for this country against the vast accumulation of goods stored up abroad. Protection will be needed against the Prussians most of all. And there will be no protection unless Mr. Hughes forces the issue.

It will not do to say that Prussia can not take the seas, as her merchant marine is depleted, for that would be untrue. A greater fleet of ships than existed before the war is being built, and these will come with full cargoes, bringing in cheaply produced goods that will simply swamp the American manufacturers, who are producing at high cost of labor, material, and transportation. Wake up, Mr. Hughes!

The fact is, Mr. President, that that article outlines a correct economic policy. What we should be considering now is what rates of duties we are going to impose on imports into this country which will prevent the destruction, or the partial destruction, of our manufacturing industries when the war is over, and this antidumping power is simply a makeshift, which, as I have said, I believe will be ineffective and without value.

During the discussion which took place this morning something was said about the relative values of the policies of the two political parties. I wish to briefly state the results which have come from a protective policy, as it represents the Republican Party, and a policy such as the present law, which is indorsed by the Democratic Party.

Perhaps no better illustration could be given of the results obtained from the operation of a law based on the theory of protection in contradistinction to one based on revenue than what has actually resulted since the 1st of August, 1897, when the Dingley bill became effective, down to the end of the calendar year 1915. Protective-tariff laws were in effect 194 months of that time, the total receipts from customs being $4,455,724,771, a monthly average of $22,967,653. During the same time the internal-revenue receipts, largely obtained from liquor and tobacco, averaged $22,53[illegible],842, bringing the monthly average revenue from these two sources to $45,502,495. The total monthly receipts of the Government from all sources were $49,886,351, while the average monthly expenditures during that period were $47,902,492, leaving an average monthly balance of $1,983,859.

During the remaining part of the period to the 1st of January, 1915, 27 months, a tariff for revenue only has been in force. During this time the receipts from customs have been $513,641,546, or $19,023,760 a month, while the receipts from internal-revenue taxes have averaged $34,116,302 a month. The total receipts of the Government during this period have averaged $58,505,483, while the expenditures have averaged $60,070,670, an excess of expenditures over receipts of $1,565,187. In other words, the receipts from customs have been reduced more than 15 per cent; the receipts from internal taxes have increased 50 per cent, and the total taxes collected have increased about 18 per cent, while the total expenditures of the Government have increased 25 per cent. Therefore the claim made after the Underwood bill was passed that the tariff bill would produce ample revenue falls to the ground.

There is one other matter that I want very briefly to call to the attention of the Senate and I should like the attention of the Senator from North Carolina. On page 79 of the bill there is a provision relating to the sale of products to ammunition makers. Commencing with line 10 in the second paragraph this expression is used:

> And every corporation selling to or manufacturing for any corporation mentioned in paragraph 1.

What I want to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina is whether "corporation" means any other organization than that to which the usual term would apply?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator will find a definition of the term "corporation" in the preceding section.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is found on page 71.

Mr. WEEKS. "The term 'corporation' includes corporations, joint-stock companies, and associations." I notice that that does not include sales made by individuals to ammunition makers. Is it intended to omit sales made by individuals?

Mr. THOMAS. It is. They were intentionally excluded.

Mr. WEEKS. That is the point I want to call attention to.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator want a reason for it?

Mr. WEEKS. If there can be a reason.

Mr. THOMAS. There are several reasons. The best reason is that individuals are subject to the surtax under the income-tax provisions of the law and corporations are not. Consequently the tax is confined to those who are not subject to any surtax.

Mr. WEEKS. Most of the products which go into ammunition, like copper, zinc, lead, antimony, steel, and iron are produced by corporations, and I assume that a corporation which produces copper and sells it for the manufacture of munitions is going to be taxed.

Mr. THOMAS. Its profit will be taxed to the extent which it goes into the manufacture of munitions.

Mr. WEEKS. I anticipate that the producer of zinc and the producer of lead and the producer of iron will be in exactly the same class.

Mr. THOMAS. Not at all.

Mr. WEEKS. To the extent that their product is the production of a corporation.

Mr. THOMAS. Not at all, unless they sell directly to the manufacturer, directly for the manufacturer of munitions.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not quite understand the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps I can make myself clear by an illustration. If I am the owner of a mine producing zinc or lead or copper, and the Senator is the owner of a smelter or an institution which refines the metals and separates them, and he sells or deals with munition makers, that would be the case. The tax falls upon his profits and not upon me. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. WEEKS. He would pay you that much less for your raw material.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think so; but that is a matter of argument.

Mr. WEEKS. It seemed to me that all these articles that go into the manufacture of ammunition, whether they are produced by an individual or by a corporation, should be taxed on the same basis. My attention was particularly called to the production and the use of linters, because I was looking up some figures relating to the relative cost of articles that go into a 3-inch shrapnel and other classes of projectiles; it developed in that investigation that there had been since the beginning of the war something like a million bales of linters or cotton scrapings, whatever they are called, sold to the munition manufacturers of this country, that the prevailing price before the war was not in excess of 2 cents a pound for such a product, while the prevailing price under war conditions has been from 7 to 8 cents a pound. It seemed to me that if such industries as copper and lead and iron were to be taxed directly or indirectly through corporations or otherwise somebody dealing in linters should pay a tax, as I have the figures—as many as 500,000,000 pounds of linters have been converted into gunpowder since the beginning of the European war.

Mr. THOMAS. They are included.

Mr. WEEKS. Who pays that tax?

Mr. THOMAS. As I said before, those who deal directly with the ammunition makers pay the tax.

Mr. WEEKS. Suppose the producer of linters is an individual.

Mr. THOMAS. If the producer is an individual and sells directly, he does not pay the tax.

Mr. WEEKS. That is the point I want to make.

Mr. THOMAS. Because he is liable to a surtax under the income-tax law.

Mr. SIMMONS. It may be that I can help to clear up the matter for the Senate as far as linters are concerned. Linters are the product of cottonseed-oil makers, all of which are corporations.

Mr. WEEKS. Possibly. I do not know about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The tax would be paid by the corporations that sell linters to the manufacturers of munitions. Cotton would be probably on a different basis. Where cotton is used it is not sold by manufacturers; it is sold by farmers to brokers who represent cotton houses, generally in New York. Whether they are corporations or not I do not know. I do not think myself any very great amount of cotton has been used in the manufacture of munitions, although it is declared by some that a large amount has been used. I think the cotton that has been used has been in the form of linters, the product of corporations.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to say to the Senators in charge of the bill that they ought to be congratulated for having made the House bill in this paragraph so much better than it is. The bill as it passed the House in that particular provision was absolutely indefensible. In this case I assume that it is the purpose of the Senate committee to require a payment of a duty on every article that goes into ammunition, and that should be the case from whatever source it comes, either from an individual or from a corporation. If it is possible that any considerable quantity of cotton or any considerable quantity of linters, or any considerable quantity of any other product, goes into munitions which are produced by an individual, then this tax should be made to apply to individuals as well as to corporations to make it equitable and fair.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think, if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me before he leaves the Chamber, I understood the Senator from Colorado to state the reason why he had not included individuals. Am I correct about that?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. The Senator from Massachusetts does not accept the reason as sufficient.

Mr. WEEKS. It does not seem to me that the tax would apply in cases where the individual sold his product to the manufacturer of ammunition, if there were such cases.

Mr. SIMMONS. My recollection is that where this tax is imposed upon the manufacturer of munitions we permit the corporations in making their returns under the income-tax law to deduct the amount of tax paid to the Government on their product, thereby exempting them from the income tax upon that product. The Senator will see that they are corporations, and corporations do not pay any surtax, but an individual does pay a surtax. If the individual was required to pay this tax and then required to pay a surtax upon his income, the corporation and the individual would be taxed on a different basis.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think that that would be unusual in this bill; but let me put a concrete case to the Senator from North Carolina. Suppose he owned a copper mine, and owned a smelter as an individual, and he sent his ore to his own smelter and then sold the product to a manufacturer of ammunition—would the Senator from North Carolina pay any tax under this provision of the bill which we are now discussing?

Mr. THOMAS. He would not, but if his profits exceeded $20,000, he would pay a surtax; and that tax increases, as the Senator knows, in proportion as the income increases.

Mr. WEEKS. Has the Senator any figures to indicate whether that would put a corporation and an individual on an equality?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I have no definite figures on the subject. In regard to the concrete case assumed by the Senator, I think I can say with perfect safety that there is no such case. I know of no instance where a mine owned by an individual is of sufficient importance to justify the running of a smelter in conection with it. I think all that work is corporate work.

Mr. President, I wish to read into the RECORD a clipping from the Washington Post of August 6. My purpose in so doing is to contrast this statement with the assertion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] yesterday and reiterated this afternoon that the people of the United States were at present more heavily taxed than any other. The headline of this article is "American women in England pay $500,000,000 yearly to war fund." The article seems to be a telegram from London, dated August 5:

AMERICAN WOMEN IN ENGLAND PAY $500,000,000 YEARLY TO WAR FUND.

LONDON, August 5.

The sum of $500,000,000 will be contributed annually to the allies by American women who have married Englishmen and made England their home, according to the last estimates of the tax officials. The incomes of these women are derived almost entirely from American real estate and American securities. All will have to pay the Government a third of the revenue.

Which, of course, is an income tax of 33⅓ per cent, very much larger than anything which so far as I know has been imposed as an income tax by any nation anywhere in time of peace.

A few of the more prominent American heiresses and their contributions to the British war chest are as follows:

The Duchess of Roxburghe, née Miss Goelet, $500,000.
The Duchess of Marlborough, née Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt, $150,000.
The Duchess of Manchester, née Miss Helen Zimmerman, $100,000.

I think it would be extremely difficult for the Senator from New Hampshire or anyone else to convince any of those upon whom this burden of tax rests that the United States is the most oppressive of all countries in its methods and rates of taxation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, quite a little has been said on the floor of the Senate with regard to the free-trade tariff, and I wish to call attention——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to have printed in the RECORD a page from the present tariff law, concerning agricultural products and provisions. It is in line with the discussion I think the Senator is about to enter upon, from his opening remark. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] in an outburst in his speech said that everything the farmer produces has been placed upon the free list in the present tariff law. I wish simply to have incorporated in the RECORD a list of farm products upon which duties are imposed. It covers a little over a page.

In addition to that I wish to add the fact that while wheat is nominally upon the free list it is clearly subject to a duty. Because of Canada's failure to comply with the conditions we imposed upon wheat going upon the free list, there were only 59 bushels of wheat introduced into this country last year without the payment of a duty, and in the year 1916 there have been 5,703,000 bushels dutiable.

I ask that page 22 of the present law and the part of page 23 which I have marked be included in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, no nation can pay for its imports except by its exports. It can not pay for imports with gold except for a very limited period. There is an economic reaction when a State deprives itself of gold or when another State has a grossly undue preponderance of gold. The effect in a State which has a very large volume of gold and currency is to give less purchasing power to the dollar. That brings about its own ultimate correction, so that the principle of economic law should be fully recognized and freely acknowledged.

That exports are paid for by imports. That a nation must permit and encourage imports if it would encourage its own exports.

If the people of the United States desire to enlarge their exports they will be compelled by a law of economic necessity to permit and to encourage imports into this country. I agree that the encouragement of these imports should be in a large degree of those things which are not produced in kind or quantity sufficient in this country, of those things which are not produced in quality in this country.

I think, therefore, that our policy should be a system under which we would encourage imports of a character which would not subject our own production to any unfair or harmful competition.

The measure now on the statute books, a strictly revenue tariff, although a highly protective tariff incidentally—the Democratic tariff law—has been viciously and unjustly denounced by partisan Republican Senators as a free-trade measure. The term "free trade" seems to be regarded by them as a political epithet with which to conjure votes, as free trade in our custom-houses might admit dangerous foreign competition. I venture to remind the Senate that it is the "free trade" between our 48 sovereign Commonwealths, freedom from interruption of our industries and commerce between the States that has resulted in the gigantic development of the United States in so large a measure, a measure so gigantic that it is difficult for a man to grasp its significance.

I send to the desk and ask that it be inserted, without reading, a statement of the bank clearings in more than 100 cities in the United States for the week ending August 17, as reported by Bradstreet's. They were $4,306,000,000. At the same rate for the year they would amount to $223,000,000,000 of exchanges in these particular banks. When it is remembered, Mr. President, that these exchanges only measure the checks which one bank receives upon the correspondent clearing house banks in the same city, when it is remembered that these exchanges do not cover the vast volume of checks which come in upon a bank for transfers of credits on the internal books of the bank, when it is remembered that they do not cover cash transactions, when it is remembered that these exchanges do not measure the volume of checks in those local institutions that are not connected with exchanges, covering tens of thousands of banks, it will be no exaggeration, I take it, to say that the present current exchanges in this country will amount to approximately $400,000,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma will be inserted in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

THE COUNTRY'S BANK CLEARINGS.

Mr. OWEN. It has been this free trade among the States—freedom of intercourse, freedom from interruption, freedom from annoyance, freedom from the red tape appertaining to the customhouses—that has permitted and developed this gigantic commerce in the United States. Free competition has developed our industries in the 48 States and has not stifled them.

Mr. President, the truth is that this so-called Democratic "tariff for revenue only" bill is an incidental protective tariff of an extremely high rate. No matter what you may call it, it is a protective tariff that is very much higher than it ought to be right now on an average. The Republicans say in their platform that they favor only a "tariff high enough to measure the difference of cost in production at home and abroad." Well, what are the factors that enter into the difference of cost at home and abroad? Labor, and practically nothing else. We are as free to buy raw materials as anybody in the world, except in so far as we hamper our own hands by our own statutes. The only remaining element is the element of labor and capital.

Capital we have in greater abundance than any nation on earth.

It has been demonstrated that the efficiency of American labor—which amounts to $2,400 per annum per capita for the laborers engaged in these industrial enterprises—so far exceeds the per capita production of European labor that the theory that European labor is cheaper than ours can not be sustained as an economic truth.

But, Mr. President, if it should cost nothing for labor in Europe, nevertheless the tariff act, known as the Payne-Aldrich bill, was far higher in every case in every schedule than the total labor cost.

I send to the desk a table compiled on this subject on April 12, 1909, which I desire to have inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

[8] Should be $13,270,192,088.

Mr. OWEN. From this table it appears that under the chemical schedule—Schedule A of the Payne-Aldrich Act—the value of products, including custom work and repairing, was $572,000,000 and the wages were $44,000,000; the total ratio of wages to the value of the product was 7½ per cent and yet the tariff was 28 per cent—400 per cent greater than the total labor cost. Is it necessary to protect labor by having a tariff four times as high as the total labor cost? In reality the purpose of putting up this Payne-Aldrich tariff to such a high figure was not honest protection nor merely to produce revenue, but was for the purpose of preventing foreign shipments in here, and preventing any manner of competition with American manufacturers in order that American corporations might establish monopolies and speculate on stocks and bonds on this artificial legislative basis. So on many of these schedules the tariff rates went as high as 100 per cent of the actual value of the product.

On earthenwares and glassware—Schedule B—the ratio of labor was 36 per cent to the cost of the product, and the tariff was 48 per cent, although there is a natural protection on earths and earthenware of a very high freight charge, because of their heavy weight bulk and low relative values as to weight.

In the case of metals—Schedule C—the ratio of wages to the value of the product was only 20 per cent, whereas the tariff was 31.65 per cent—150 per cent as compared to the total cost of labor.

So with regard to wood and manufactures of wood—Schedule D; so with regard to sugar, molasses, and manufactures in Schedule E, where the labor cost was only 5 per cent, and yet the tariff was 65 per cent; in other words, it was 13 times as much as the total labor cost.

In the matter of Schedule F, tobacco, the labor bore the relation of 18 per cent of the whole value, and the tariff was 87 per cent. These schedules, E and F, are really revenue-producing items, and these high rates are intended in large measure to raise revenue and not merely to protect labor.

In the matter of spirits, wines, and beverages—Schedule G—the labor cost is only 9 per cent, and the tariff rate was 88 per cent; in other words, a tariff rate, as compared to the labor cost, of over 900 per cent more than the total labor cost. This is a revenue producer but highly prohibitive incidentally.

In the case of cotton manufactures—Schedule H—the labor cost was 21 per cent, and the tariff was 47 per cent—over 200 per cent of the total labor cost.

In the case of flax, hemp, and jute—Schedule I—the total labor cost was only 14 per cent, and the tariff was 44 per cent—over 400 per cent of the total labor cost.

In the case of wool—Schedule K—the total labor cost was 17 per cent, and the tariff was 58 per cent—over 300 per cent of the total labor cost.

In the case of silk—Schedule L—the total labor cost, compared to the value of the product, was 20 per cent, while the tariff was 60 per cent—over 300 per cent of the total labor cost.

In the case of pulp, papers, and books—Schedule M—the total labor cost, compared to the product, was 22 per cent and the tariff was 21.88 per cent—approximately the same as the entire labor cost. In this case, because of the bulk and the weight, there is an important natural protection by virtue of freight and distance.

In the case of sundries, the total labor cost was 18 per cent and the total tariff was 23 per cent.

So this talk about free trade and tariff is perfectly preposterous and should mislead no thoughtful, patriotic citizen. We have in every instance but one a tariff which far more than measures the full cost of labor in these products, and in the case of some of these schedules the tariff is from 200 to 300 and 400 per cent of the total labor cost. This talk about any of these tariffs being anything but protective tariffs is not justified in fact, and would be ridiculous were it not so tragical in its evil results. This tariff, so far as the question of protection is concerned, on many of these schedules could be cut down in the most substantial way without reaching the level of honest protection and without reaching the measure of what would be a fair protective tariff based on the theory of the Republican Party itself—that the tariff should measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

Mr. President, I merely wanted to point out this truth to the country. I rose for that purpose, and for that purpose only. I am not going into a detailed discussion of the tariff. I am not going to take any more of the valuable time of the Senate. I want, however, to call attention to another matter which I think is of great importance, with regard to the question of the prosperity of the country springing from Democratic policies and point out on what it is based.

It has been repeatedly suggested here that the prosperity of the country is fictitious and not real. Therefore, when I call attention to the fact that our internal commerce amounts to $400,000,000,000 and the outside estimate of our shipments to Europe of munitions amounts to only $2,000,000,000, or one-half of 1 per cent of what our internal commerce is, it is perfectly obvious that the shipments of munitions of war to Europe are almost a negligible part of the business of the United States.

The real thing which has developed in the last two years the tremendous activity in the United States is that, for the first time in this country, we have the assurance given to our business men—our manufacturers, merchants, miners, and so forth—that the credit upon which they must transact their business can not artificially nor by conspiracy be taken from them again by Wall Street conspiracies, but that they can certainly get money when they need it upon a legitimate basis. That vital and stupendous credit fact has given hope to men, and they have gone into new enterprises of all kinds. The era of our prosperity has only begun. Happily for us it is a condition which will be equally beneficial both to Democrats and Republicans, Socialists and Prohibitionists and woman suffragists throughout our great Republic.

I want, Mr. President, without reading, to put into the RECORD a statement of Theodore H. Price upon this question, which I think of great interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

PRESIDENT WILSON AND PROSPERITY—IS THE LATTER DUE TO THE WAR OR THE ADMINISTRATION? THE POLITICAL SIGNIFICANCE OF THE ANSWER.

[By Theodore H. Price.]

Not long ago I was talking with the superintendent of a large manufacturing establishment in New England. He had about 6,000 employees under him. I asked him how they were going to vote. He replied that, though they lived in a State that was nominally Republican, and most of them usually voted the Republican ticket, as he did, he thought they would nearly all vote for Wilson next election. I inquired why. "Well," he said, "there are two reasons: First, Wilson has kept us out of war, and these people feel that if there had been any fighting they would have had to take the bullets, though New York might have had to raise the money; second, they have had more work at better wages than ever before in my recollection."

I reminded him that the Republicans claimed that our remarkable prosperity was not due to the Democratic administration but existed in spite of it; that they urged that the advantage of a protective tariff had been demonstrated by a war which shut out all foreign competition; and that they insisted that the loss of our national honor was the price we had to pay for peace.

"That's all very well," he retorted, "but Wilson has given us prosperity—he hasn't asked us to be content with promises; and as to our honor, time enough to consider that when the rights of some of those who live here and are willing to stay here are attacked. Most of those who are here, or their fathers, left Europe to escape the enforced military service that would be their lot if we went to war, and Wilson is right in leaving a lot of bloated aristocrats to fry in their own grease, while they hide behind the poor devils that they put on the firing line.

"These fellows here are brave enough," he said, "but they care a lot more about their wives and children than they do about all the kings and princes that ever lived."

I report this conversation because it expresses what I am convinced is the attitude of a large majority of the wage earners of the United States.

Their political conclusions are admittedly subjective. They have no use for economic theories. Most of them are spending the larger portion of what they make. The first duty of government, as they conceive it, is to provide them with an opportunity to earn a living and to live in comparative happiness and comfort. The party or the administration that does this will get their votes and retain their support until employment is not to be had, or the purchasing power of the wages paid is seriously diminished. I do not mean to indorse this view. From the standpoint of the political or the patriotic idealist there is much to be said against it; but there is also much to be said in favor of it, if it be true that the greatest happiness of the greatest number is the chief end of government. Since it is the view that will largely control in the approaching presidential campaign, it is in order to review the politico-economic development of the United States under the Wilson administration, and to contrast the conditions that prevailed in 1912 and 1913, which were the last years of Republican ascendency, with those which exist in 1916, after only 40 months of Wilson.

It would not be difficult to present pages of figures that would show the marvelous economic progress of the United States since 1912–13, but they would be tiresome in the monotony of expansion that they would disclose, and the following brief comparison between the more important indicia of business activity and progress under Wilson and his Republican predecessors will suffice. Wherever possible this comparison is made between the figures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and that ending June 30, 1912, but in many cases the statistics for these dates have not been available, and others covering an interval nearly as significant have been used.

There are other facts equally important that can not be subjected to the telling comparison of the parallel column. In all parts of the country transportation lines, rail and water, are taxed beyond their capacity. Freight embargoes have been resorted to in many instances. Shipbuilding is progressing on a scale unknown since the Civil War.

So far as labor is concerned, we have the word of Samuel Gompers that never before in the history of the world were so many people employed at such high wages and under such excellent conditions as is the case in the United States to-day. No capable man need be idle. Throughout the West farm hands are offered $3 a day and board, and farmers themselves have rarely experienced such prosperity.

According to an analysis made by the bureau of statistics and information of the State Industrial Commission of New York, the number of employees was 21 per cent greater and wages paid were 37 per cent higher for factory employees in New York State in April, 1916, than in April, 1915. The same thing is approximately true of most other industrial communities.

Another interesting side light on present business conditions is furnished by a comparative summary of the number of agate lines of advertising published during the month of June this year and last in the newspapers of the larger cities. Here it is:

Summary of total advertising for June.

Commenting upon this showing, the New York Evening Post says:

"Business conditions throughout the country have an excellent general barometer in the counting rooms of the leading daily newspapers in the large cities. When the advertising columns of such newspapers show substantial gains in all cities, there is but the one conclusion to be drawn—the public has money to spend and is spending it. The big manufacturers, who constitute the national advertisers, and the stores and shops are enjoying increased prosperity."

Facing this summarized record of the Nation's growth since they were removed from power, the Republicans, through their candidate, endeavor to belittle the showing by saying: "No intelligent man is deceived by the temporary prosperity due to abnormal conditions." The implication intended is that the European war is entirely responsible for a prosperity that we would not otherwise have enjoyed. Let us analyze the facts. It will be admitted that whatever profit the United States has derived from the war in Europe is measured exclusively by the increase in the balance of trade in our favor.

As our imports have varied but slightly since 1912, the increase in our exports must include everything that we have gained from the expansion in our foreign trade.

This increase in exports is about equal to the increase in our trade balance, and while it can not all be profit—for the cost of producing the things exported should be deducted from it—we will, for the purposes of this argument, assume that our war gains equal the entire amount by which our balance of trade has exceeded the normal average before the war.

For the four fiscal years ending June 30, 1914, our favorable balance averaged $550,000,000 a year. For the last two years it has been as follows:

For the year ending June 30, 1915	$1,094,000,000
For the year ending June 30, 1916	2,136,000,000
Total	3,230,000,000
Normal for two years, $550,000,000 each	1,100,000,000
Increase for two years of war	2,130,000,000

This increase of $2,130,000,000 is manifestly in excess of our entire gain from the war. It is equal to our profits plus the cost of production, and it is only through the increase in our foreign trade that the war can have profited us at all. Our maximum possible gain from the war is therefore $21.30 per capita.

This, then, is the measure of our abnormal prosperity. Against it we find that our national wealth has increased by $41,000,000,000, or $410 per capita. Our debt to Europe has been reduced by $3,340,000,000, or $33 per capita; our total bank deposits have increased by $6,570,000,000, or $65 per capita; and the value of our manufactured products by $9,400,000,000, or $94 per capita. If the war in Europe has been the only reason for our prosperity, by what alchemy has the gain of only $2,130,000,000 from our foreign trade been multiplied nearly twenty times in the growth of our national wealth? The Republicans must supply the answer if they can.

Until they do, the nonpartisan economist will believe that, while the war has undoubtedly stimulated the foreign demand for some things, our prosperity has been mainly due to the encouragement that has been given to business and enterprise by the Democratic Party under the leadership of President Wilson.

The work of the administration in this respect is unparalleled. Never before have so many sound and necessary economic reforms been enacted into law in so short a time. The list is a long one. Our political memory is short. Let us refresh it.

Since Woodrow Wilson became President Congress has passed:

1. The Federal reserve act, which stands out as the most superlatively beneficial legislation that any party has ever given to the people. Through it business has been unfettered and panics have become almost impossible. The strength and mobility that have been given to our financial resources through the Federal Reserve System have enabled us to withstand the shock of the greatest war in history and have converted what might have been a period of utter prostration into one of extreme prosperity.

2. The rural credit bill, which gives the farmer the same access to credit that has hitherto been reserved to the business man.

3. The income-tax law, under which the inordinately rich are contributing a larger share toward the maintenance of a Government which protects them in the possession of their large and unnecessary fortunes.

4. The Federal Trade Commission act, which seeks to remedy industrial injustice, prevent unfair competition, and protect both the business man and the public. It provides for a continuing and careful investigation into business conditions. In the words of the President, it "substitutes the gentler processes of counsel for the harshness of criminal law," and attempts to correct abuses without injuring the innocent.

5. The Clayton bill, which defines the indefinite negations of the Sherman law, prohibits interlocking directorates, delegalizes the monopolistic control of one corporation by another, and declares "that the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce."

6. The good-roads law, which extends Federal aid to the States in road building and promises greatly to facilitate human intercourse in the country districts, reverse the cityward tendency of our population and enormously increase the value of our agricultural land by making it more accessible.

7. The Smith-Lever agricultural education act, which provides for Federal cooperation with the States in extending a knowledge of progressive farming and responds to the demand that "the last load of illiteracy shall be lifted from American youth."

To these should be added the child-labor bill, now advocated by the President, and numerous other less important measures which evidence the wise solicitude of the administration for the business of a Nation that consists chiefly of business men.

This solicitude has been manifest not only in constructive legislation, but in the manifold activities of the various great departments of the Government.

The Agricultural Department has extended its work aggressively and variously.

The Secretary of the Treasury has taken the lead in organizing many movements for the relief and extension of commerce.

The Post Office Department has been conducted at a profit instead of a loss, as under Taft and Roosevelt. The Rural Free Delivery Service has been greatly extended. The parcel post has been popularized, and the depositors in the postal savings banks have increased from 165,000 in 1913 to 550,000 in 1915.

The Department of Justice, while pursuing real criminals relentlessly, has inaugurated no political prosecutions for the glory of trust busting, and has preferred to caution rather than persecute those who were guiltless of any intent to transgress our complex laws.

The State Department, under the personal direction of the President, has secured for us the benefits of peace without the loss of honor, and the candid-minded man must admit that we have benefited humanity more by our diplomacy than we could have done by a resort to arms that would have cost millions of lives and billions of treasure.

It is true that mistakes have been made, but they have been quickly corrected. "A wise man changes his opinion, a fool never," and considering the difficulties of his position and the divided public opinion of the country, the President has shown marvelous skill in guiding the ship of state through the most troublous period of the world's history.

The hindsight of the critic is naturally more accurate, though less necessary, than the foresight of the statesman, but the fact that his detractors can find nothing except the idealism of the President's Mexican policy to attack shows how remarkably correct most of his judgments have been.

Through it all he has never lost sight of or sympathy with American business, industry, and labor. Toward them his policy has been one of constant solicitude. It has found expression in the Halls of Congress, in the White House, and in all his public utterances.

If there is any relation whatever between constructive legislation and business progress, between conservation and prosperity, and between the statutory enactment of economic law and material advancement, then we must conclude that the marvelous business development in America during the past two years is due to the policies of the President rather than to the war in Europe.

Can there be any doubt as to the disposition of the people toward a public servant who can give such an account of his stewardship? In one of his essays upon the United States John Stuart Mill said that "the American people, when confronted with grave economic questions, often seemed upon the point of doing the wrong thing, but in the end the common sense of the people has prevailed and they have done the right thing."

Since the time of Mill the common sense and economic sanity of the American people have not diminished. Thanks to the conservatism, tact, and statesmanship of President Wilson, we have become the most powerful Nation in the world, both morally and economically.

That the majority of the American people recognize this and will insist upon retaining the services of a man who has served them so well is a conclusion of both logic and observation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire to say that the farmers have not been hurt by the Democratic tariff. Practically no wheat has been brought into the United States from Canada, as it was prophesied by the Republicans it would be, and the prices of farm products ought to be satisfactory to the farmers, if not to Republican statesmen seeking to discredit the Democratic administration. In this connection I quote the following prices of farm products:

Prime steers, per hundredweight	$10.65
Hogs, per hundredweight	10.80
Spring lambs, per hundredweight	10.65
Hard wheat, per bushel	1.55
Soft wheat, per bushel	1.58
Oats, per bushel	.45
Kafir, per bushel	1.65
Rye, per bushel	1.25
Barley, per bushel	.80

Cotton to-day—August 25, 1916—reached 16 cents a pound.

Mr. President, when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was up, in June, 1909, I pointed out several substantial principles which I believed were most thoroughly established in the comments which I made in the Senate on June 15, 1909, and which will be printed in the RECORD of Saturday, August 26, 1916. I wish to call attention to them, and shall do so very briefly.

In the course of that speech I said:

"LABOR COST.

"Labor cost in wages in the protected industries, measured by efficiency and the purchasing power of wages paid to labor, is approximately the same in the United States as in Europe, except where the American wage-earner is highly organized.

"1. I shall undertake to show that this is true by showing that the money paid American labor in protected industries is approximately on an average but little more than that paid in Europe.

"2. That the American workman is twice as efficient, and because of efficiency is entitled to twice the wage of the European workman, and that the difference in labor cost compared to the value of the product is in favor of the American manufacturer.

"3. I shall undertake to show that $150 of wages in the United States buys only what $100 buys in Europe in manufactured goods, and for this reason the American manufacturer does not pay his labor as much in proportion to work done as the European manufacturer.

"4. I shall undertake to show, finally, that the total percentage of wages to the gross product of all American manufacturers is only 17.8 per cent of the gross value of the product, and, therefore, that the difference in the cost of production in the United States and abroad must be on an average less than this percentage. If labor abroad cost half as much as in the United States, as the high protectionists pretend, then the difference in cost of production necessary to be provided for by a purely protective tariff would be less than the average of 10 per cent, while a revenue tariff would be between 30 and 40 per cent.

"I shall undertake to show the bad effect of a prohibitive tariff on wages, on commerce, on distribution of wealth, and in corrupting of public and private life.

"3. Effect of prohibitive tariff.

"ON WAGES.

"(a) Has lowered wages relative to product.

"(b) Has lowered wages in protected industries compared to unprotected industries.

"(c) Has lowered purchasing power of wages.

"(d) Has established monopoly, and, consequently,

"1. Has prevented or obstructed the organization of labor.

"2. Restricted output and diminished demand for labor.

"3. Has substituted foreign pauper labor for American labor.

"4. Has required ruinous hours.

"5. Subjected labor to bad housing, bad water, insanitary conditions.

"6. Has increased mortality of labor.

"7. Has destroyed political liberty of its labor in large measure.

"8. Has impaired labor's commercial independence.

"9. Has appropriated all the net proceeds of labor and accumulated it in the hands of the few.

"ON COMMERCE.

"(a) Has weakened our imports and exports.

"(b) Has diminished the output of smaller factories, depending for material on monopolies.

"(c) Has raised prices in United States 50 per cent above the prices abroad, thus diminishing consumption.

"1. This means a ruinous tax on the man or woman with fixed income. A man with income of $1,500 has one-third of income confiscated by monopolies' high prices.

"This affects all men with fixed income. The clerk, the servant, the Government employee, the pensioner, the man receiving fixed return from investment, yields one-third of it all to monopoly.

"ON DISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH.

"1. It has piled up enormous wealth in few hands, which now grows with accumulating force, absorbing all natural opportunities of life. The oil fields, coal, ore, timber, transportation and transmission services, municipal franchises, real estate, water powers, with the inevitable result, if not checked, of commercial mastery and commercial slavery and destruction of political independence.

"2. It has corrupted our public life, our elections, our cities, our courts, legislatures, and executive officers, and our private citizens."

Mr. President, in justification of that arraignment I set forth the overwhelming evidence fully at that time. I have asked permission of the Senate to reinsert that speech in the RECORD, and I call the attention of my fellow countrymen to that evidence. It will be found in the RECORD following the remarks I am now making when published.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Chair understands the Senator from Oklahoma has already received permission to print the speech referred to by him in the RECORD.

Mr. OWEN. I have, but I should like to have it printed in the RECORD at the earliest practicable moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if his attention has been directed to page 20 of Document No. 366 of the present session of Congress, where this statement is made:

> In the case of industries with an output representing more than one-fifth of the entire production of the country wages constituted less than 5 per cent of the value of the product. In the case of industries contributing another one-fifth of the total output, wages represented from 5 to 15 per cent of the value of the product. In industries contributing still another one-fifth, wages represented from 15 to 20 per cent of the value of the product. Wages in most of the remaining industries represented 20 to 30 per cent of the value of the product, while in the case of only one-twentieth of the entire production did the expenditure for wages exceed 30 per cent. (Table 23.)

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have observed it, and have pointed out that the tariff rate was equal to from 100 per cent to 1,300 per cent of the total labor cost. I was calling attention to a table which I had made up on June 15, 1909, when the Payne-Aldrich bill was under discussion, where for the first time, so far as I know, the facts were shown that the tariff was invariably higher than the total labor cost, and therefore much higher than required if the tariff duties should merely represent the difference between the cost of labor at home and abroad. I have been much interested in and enlightened by the detailed statement of the facts in connection with the present tariff law, because in making up these figures in 1909 I dealt with the schedules as schedules of the Payne-Aldrich Act, and did not go into separate items. But the Democrats were fully justified in reducing it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if his attention has been called to the table on pages 70 and 71 of the document referred to by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] a few moments ago, in which there is given the percentage of labor cost in 1909, according to the census of manufactures of that year—which afforded the last reliable information we have on which to base such figures—giving the percentage of labor to the total value of product? In that table there is also given the percentage of labor cost compared with the average rate of duty carried under the present bill, showing that it more than equals in many industries, which are enumerated, the total labor cost, and in other industries more than equals any possible difference in the wage cost here and abroad. I will hand the table to the Senator, and ask him if he does not desire to incorporate it in his remarks?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am glad to have it, and will be glad to incorporate it in my remarks. It confirms what I have heretofore said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. OWEN. That table shows overwhelmingly and conclusively that labor in this country, under the revenue tariff passed by the Democratic Congress, is fully and completely protected; and the only difficulty about it is that the protection the Democrats have tried to give to labor has been so largely diverted and "sneaked" into the pockets of other people.

THE TARIFF.

SPEECH OF HON. ROBERT L. OWEN, DELIVERED IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, TUESDAY, JUNE 15, 1909.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, no consideration would induce me to propose or contend for a tariff reduction which would seriously harm any American industry whose existence is justified by the natural resources of our country.

Upon my oath as a Senator of the United States I feel charged with a solemn responsibility of defending the welfare of the people of the United States, including as vigorously and as distinctly the interests of the people of Maine, of Rhode Island, or of California as the interests of the people of Oklahoma. I shall discharge that duty as an American in a broad and liberal spirit, with patience, with tolerance, and perfect fairness.

By that sense of duty I have felt impelled to submit to the Senate the reasons which make it impossible for me to support H. R. 1438. I can not agree to the passage of this bill without the registration of a solemn protest against it. I plainly see the evil results upon the people of the United States which have followed the McKinley bill and the Dingley bill and which must follow the passage of a worse measure.

Mr. President, I am not unmindful that what I shall say will not deter the managers of this bill in the Senate in the least from their predetermined course, but I deem it my duty to place upon the records of the Senate and of the United States the reasons which justify my protest and from which future students may perhaps find something of value in determining this question, when they shall consider it with intellectual and moral integrity and not in a spirit of trade, of barter, or of easy compliance with the demand of special interests whose lobbyists swarm the corridors of this Capitol.

Mr. President, mere denunciation of a bill, or of the managers of the bill, I regard as serving no good purpose unless proof is offered which shall be convincing to thoughtful and honest men that the condemnation is thoroughly justified.

In pointing out the injurious effects of what I shall demonstrate to be a monopoly-protecting tariff upon our entire people, including every class of consumers, every class of producers, every class of manufacturers or distributers or merchants except the masters of monopoly, I shall do so dispassionately, with a composed temper and with an earnest desire to offer reasons, at least, to those now trusted by our people with power why they should not persist in a policy full of injury and harm to the Republic.

I shall be compelled in this discussion to point out the logical consequences of a monopoly-protecting tariff; its effect, its dangerous effect, in piling up stupendous wealth on the one side in the hands of its favorites and in causing great wretchedness and poverty on the other side among the weaker and more defenseless classes of our people.

When I point out the unavoidable effect of extreme poverty as the necessary complement of unlimited wealth in the hands of the few accumulated under the shelter of law, I wish it distinctly understood that the dark picture of human misery which the truth compels me to portray breathes from me no spirit of pessimism, because I am full of hope. I recognize the immediate dawn of better things and an early remedy. The increasing intelligence of our people already begins to understand the causes of these conditions and to formulate the natural and reasonable remedy for their correction. The spirit of benevolence and of patriotism which characterizes the great body of our people and, I rejoice to say, moves a multitude of the beneficiaries of our unwise system gives promise for an early correction of the injurious consequences which naturally follow a prohibitive tariff, with its necessary brood of successful monopolies, by the reduction of that tariff; if not now, through the party in power, then by the unwearied Democracy that has been faithfully pointing out its evil for 25 years. I shall endeavor to point out some of the injurious consequences of the tariff-engendered monopolies and their crushing effect upon human life, but in doing so I shall not be understood as a pessimist, because I am precisely the contrary.

OPTIMIST.

Mr. President, I am an optimist; because I feel that the Anglo-Saxon race and the Teutonic blood represented in this country by millions of men of the northern races of Europe and Great Britain and the adopted sons of other great nations in our land have an unquenchable love of liberty, of justice, and of compassion, and will correct every evil of our great Government; because our forefathers distinguished themselves by a love of liberty that dared death in every form to establish it and maintain it in the bosom of this Republic; because our immediate forefathers not only loved liberty, but they practiced that form of government which made liberty a working force in the administration of this Government from the days when the town meeting in New England, in Massachusetts, Mr. President, in Connecticut, and in Rhode Island instructed their representatives according to the will of a free people. In those good old days when the Representative was not a machine-made politician, but was a Representative in the highest and best sense—of representing directly the opinions and the commercial interests of the common people who sent him.

I am an optimist because of my perfect confidence in the great body of the American people, whose stability, patriotism, and common sense will control this country and direct it along sound paths of good government; because I see in many directions the gradual restoration of the right and power of the people to select their public servants directly, and directly require them to carry out their will. I rejoice to see the establishment of the initiative and referendum in Maine and in Oregon and in other States, as well as in Oklahoma, and the establishment of the direct primary in so many of our States.

I rejoice to see the people instructing their legislatures in the selection of Senators, and while I did not receive any report from the Senator from Michigan, as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, I had the honor to submit during the last Congress, for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, I have felt justified in being an optimist because I was able to point out 24 States in the Union that had requested from their legislative assemblage this restoration to the people of their ancient right of rule.

Now, Mr. President, I am an optimist, notwithstanding the hostile attitude of the leaders now in control of the Senate, because already there are 29 States, including Michigan, the State of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in which the election of Senators is controlled by the direct voice of the people. (Alabama, Arkansas, California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, Washington, and Wisconsin. Of these California, Nevada, Idaho, and Michigan came in this year—1909.) It will only be a few short years when 46 of the States will be controlled in this manner; and when that day comes no Senator in this Chamber will be so callous as to mock the pledges made to the people in national platforms.

I am an optimist, Mr. President, because of the magnificent growth of our Republic under the blessings of liberty.

From 5,000,000 people in 1800 we have over eighty-five millions in 1907. From five billions of wealth in 1800 we have a hundred and twenty-five billions in 1909. From a weak Nation we have become potentially the greatest Nation in the world; but above all, Mr. President, has been our increase in the means of intelligence.

Forests are now converted into paper with lightning speed. Volumes innumerable, filled with learning upon every subject, are crowding into the pathway of knowledge; but chief of all the modern newspapers, filled with learning, wit, and humor, illustrated with splendid descriptions and photographs of everything "in the heavens above, the earth beneath, and the waters under the earth," are thrust into the hands of the wayfaring man for a price incredibly small, so that he who runs may read and instantly learn what is transpiring in regard to everything of human interest at home and abroad, so that every citizen may know at breakfast every fact transpiring on earth that he cares to know, from the diplomatic questions of foreign courts to the wonderful home run of Casey on the Chicago ball grounds, from the market quotations of London and New York to the astonishing description of the last wild beast slain on the eastern coast of Africa by one of our very distinguished fellow citizens.

While it is true that thirty-five thousand millions of dollars of the proceeds of human labor in the United States have passed into the hands of various corporations, and a very large part of all of the net proceeds of American labor have been improperly acquired by monopoly; and while 7,000,000 women have been driven from out the peaceful shelter of the American home into commercial rivalry with men; and while 5,000,000 children in like manner are being driven under the commercial whip to sacrifice their youth, in large part, to the demand of Mammon; and while there are many millions of men who regard life with great anxiety, constantly in fear of the drastic power of extreme poverty and lack of employment, still I see that the American workman, in the factories of our land, have exhibited a net output per capita of over twelve hundred dollars, from which the legitimate demand on him for the support of an American family can be met and still leave a large surplus earning.

The American people have shown that they are far more than abundantly capable of sustaining themselves and making the most substantial contribution to the wealth of the Republic and of the world and still leave themselves reasonable leisure.

And, finally, Mr. President, I am an optimist because I believe that the American people—who love liberty, who believe in self-government, who believe in mercy and in charity as well as in industry and providence—will see to it that this Government is so conducted by their representatives that in the future there shall be a more equitable distribution of the proceeds of human labor; that we shall change the present policy, whose inevitable tendency is the useless, the vulgar, and insane enrichment of the few at the expense of the misery and sorrow and of the physical and spiritual degeneration of millions of men, women, and children who are now submerged by the devices of commercialism gone mad.

The bill should not pass.

BECAUSE IT IS CONTRARY TO THE WILL OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

Mr. President, the American people were promised by both parties a reduction of the tariff, and had a right to expect substantial reduction. The representatives of one-half of the people, assembled at Denver, emphasized this matter most vigorously in the Democratic platform in the following language:

> We welcome the belated promise of tariff reform now offered by the Republican Party. * * *
> This platform declared:
>
> The people can not safely intrust the execution of this important work to a party which is so deeply obligated to the highly protected interests as is the Republican Party.
> This platform states:
> We call attention to the significant fact that the promised relief was postponed until after the coming election—an election to succeed in which the Republican Party must have the same support from the beneficiaries of the high protective tariff as it has always heretofore received from them; and to the further fact that during years of uninterrupted power no action whatever has been taken by the Republican Congress to correct the admittedly existing tariff iniquities.
>
> This platform further declared:
> We favor immediate revision of the tariff by the reduction of import duties. * * *

The party to which I have the honor to belong has, since 1876, demanded a proper reform of the inequalities, injustices, and false pretenses of a tariff controlled by selfish interests at the expense of the American people.

It never has, Mr. President, at any time contemplated so reducing the tariff as to injuriously affect any legitimate industry whatever. On the contrary, while it has pointed vigorously to the fraud and false pretenses of the monopoly protecting tariff, it always has been mindful of the rights of capital legitimately employed in manufacture, and equally mindful of labor employed in industries established under the shelter of our tariff system.

In 1884 the Democratic national platform said:

> Many industries have come to rely upon legislation for successful continuance, so that any change of law must be at every step regardful of the labor and capital thus involved. The process of reform must be subjected in the execution to this plain dictate of justice; all taxation shall be limited to the requirements of economical government. The necessary reduction of taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country.

The practice of writing these schedules at prohibitive rates and preventing competition and engendering monopoly has been fiercely condemned by the Democracy as "robbery of the great majority for the benefit of the few" (1892). It has demanded a constitutional tariff drawn for the purpose of revenue, but has not condemned the unavoidable incidental protection which any tariff for revenue, or for revenue only, unavoidably affords, and which will always be found sufficient for the incidental protection of legitimate industry.

The reason why protection AS PRACTICED has been denounced as "robbery" is because such schedules have been drawn not for constitutional revenue purposes, but to shelter monopoly and permit monopoly to wrongful tax the people under the color of a pretended revenue law.

The party to which I have the honor to belong, therefore (1908), welcomed the promise of tariff reform offered by the Republican Party in 1908 on the basis of "the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad," for the obvious reason that a tariff so drawn would necessarily be a tariff for revenue with only such incidental protection as justice and common sense requires.

It was this kind of tariff law drawn in 1846, with which both parties were well satisfied in 1856. If this law were now so drawn, the contention between the two great parties on this issue would necessarily cease. [For party platforms compared see Exhibit 11.]

The party leaders of both great parties declared the purpose of reducing the tariff downward. No manner of explanation or evasion can alter the substantial truth that it was the expressed will of the American people making itself felt through both party platforms and through both party leaders that there should be a substantial reduction of tariff duties.

The Republican platform of 1908 declares "unequivocally"—a remarkable word in a platform, and suggests the purpose of equivocation—"for revision of the tariff by special session of the Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President," and says:

> In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

The platform also says that it is the Republican policy—

> To preserve without excessive duties the security against foreign competition to which American manufacturers, farmers, and producers are entitled, but also to maintain the high standard of living of the wageworkers of this country, who are the most direct beneficiaries of the protective system.

Excessive duties are here condemned by the leaders of the Republican Party, and in 1904 the Republican platform declared:

> The measure of protection should always at least equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

Even in the majority report of the House committee, page 2, section 1, they declared:

> While duties should be protective, they should be adjusted as nearly as possible to represent the difference in cost of production at home and abroad.

IT VIOLATES THE REPUBLICAN PLEDGES.

The rates of the bill submitted by the Finance Committee average higher than the Dingley bill and are not a reduction at all.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance ostentatiously sets forth 379 items on which reductions are made.

These reductions, as will appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 5 and by Exhibit 12, I here submit, are items of no national importance. Two hundred and seventy-four of these items involve articles whose imports are less than $25,000, or severally less than one-thirtieth part of 1 penny gross imports per capita. The table which I submit gives the items in excess where the imports of such articles amounted to over $25,000, and the table discloses the fact that the total imports excepting lumber was extremely small, and that the pretended reductions are of no importance, while the increases are of substantial importance.

Mr. President, this bill should not pass, because it violates the pledges of the Republican Party and of the Republican leader during the last campaign. The party platform, I have shown above, is unequivocal. Its reasonable and natural interpretation is plain. The Senator from Indiana on May 25 set forth at great length the declarations of the President of the United States, quoting him as pledging the American people—

Genuine and honest revision * * * substantially a revision downward, though there will probably be a few exceptions—

As delivered by the President September 24, 1908.

No wonder the Republican Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] demands to know what this special session was called for, if it was merely to rewrite the Dingley bill.

No wonder the Republican Senators from Iowa, Indiana, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Wisconsin and other States vehemently protest against this betrayal of the party pledge. The Senator from Massachusetts will explain in vain to the American people that it was not the purpose of the party to have a substantial revision downward, as the President said, September 24, 1908, at Milwaukee.

The President in his inaugural address reiterated his construction of the purposes of the party, as was strongly pointed out by the Senator from Indiana, and stated in the most positive manner:

It is imperatively necessary, therefore, that a tariff bill be drawn in good faith in accordance with promises made before the election by the party in power.

And on December 17 last the President is quoted as having said before the Ohio Society:

Better no revision at all, better that the new bill should fail, unless we have an honest and thorough revision on the basis laid down and the principles outlined in the party platform.

The Republican platform declared in 1904 for a tariff law merely "equal to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," and in 1908 likewise declared for—

Such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad.

And yet the leaders of that party, neither in the House nor in the Senate, have concerned themselves to compile "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," although they have submitted many volumes of thousands of pages of confused miscellany, a small portion under oath, a large portion not under oath, with no safeguard whatever, and coming from selfish interests seeking the privilege of monopoly over the American people.

When I, as a Senator of the United States, representing the people of the United States from Maine to California, and entitled by the honor and dignity of my position to a proper answer, demand to know "why the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad" had not been compiled as a basis for the drafting of this statute, the Senator from New Hampshire rises in his place and solemnly advises me that my inquiry is "absurd." [Turning to the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. GALLINGER.] He will find his remarks on page 2214 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The suggestion is made by other Republican leaders that the information can not be obtained, and when I myself offer over 446 items which had been compiled 10 years ago by Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, they show themselves acquainted with the matter, confess that this information can be obtained, and plead that the report is not up to date.

The Senator from Rhode Island, chairman of the Committee on Finance, rises in his place, and, with a fine sense of humor excited by my request and inquiry why the difference in cost of production had not been compiled, advises me with amused satire that he will have a clerk compile for me a list of publications relating to the tariff, but will be unable to furnish me with the intelligence to digest them.

I shall not question the intelligence of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, nor shall I reply to him in kind. I appeal from him to the American people, who will not hold him guiltless for his callous and reprehensible conduct in this matter.

Mr. President, I keenly regret to feel impelled to comment in this manner upon the conduct of public business in the Senate. Not only has the chairman of the Committee on Finance not furnished the Senate "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad;" not only has he not made a proper report to the Senate in regard to this matter; not only has he replied with satirical indifference to a respectful demand for proper information which he was charged with the duty of obtaining, but he has withheld information upon this point obtained by our Department of State, through the German Government, for the express purpose of our enlightenment. He has done, Mr. President, what is infinitely more reprehensible; he has refused to the Senator of Virginia and to the other Democratic members of the Senate Finance Committee the privilege of having the same information as he himself has enjoyed by virtue of being an officer of this body; and when, Mr. President, his attention is called to this unjust and unconstitutional conduct, he justifies it by quoting from an evil precedent of Democratic origin and seemed to think he had fully answered for this breach of duty.

Mr. President, a bad Democratic precedent is no more respectable to me than a bad precedent from any other source.

The conduct of the chairman of the Committee on Finance in holding secret meetings with regard to this public matter and in giving repeated confidential audiences to the agents of monopoly, whose advice is influencing the various paragraphs of this bill in their own interests against the interests of the American people, is a bad precedent either to set or to follow, and puts the management of the Senate of the United States under the suspicion of a want of frankness and of a want of sincerity in drawing these schedules. It is of the highest national importance that the Senate of the United States and every Member of it should not only be above suspicion, but, as far as possible, beyond danger of being deceived or misled.

This evil precedent has already borne bad fruit, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance has been induced to put into this bill and to retain in this bill many so-called "jokers"—that is, words and phrases, innocent in appearance, with far-reaching consequences, favorable to the beneficiary and unfavorable to the people. These devices have already been pointed out on the floor, and I shall not pause to enumerate them. No court of justice, and no high official of Government charged with a sacred trust should permit himself to conduct "star-chamber proceedings," because it is almost sure to bring upon himself the odium of suspicion and public hostility as a Member of the United States Senate.

I enter my emphatic protest against this conduct of the public business as a precedent. It should not be permitted to stand as a precedent.

The poor excuse that the Democratic Members were lately furnished with the assistance of two statisticians does not in the least degree excuse this grossly improper method of conducting the public business. These experts were not furnished until it was too late to use their services advantageously for the proper digest and amendment of this bill.

For over a year the Republican Members have given it out that they were preparing this bill, and yet with all this time they have never yet furnished either the House or Senate with "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad" of the items in the paragraphs of the Dingley bill, which they were honor bound to do by the platform of 1904 and by the platform of 1908, which required the redrawing of these paragraphs on this precise basis.

They can furnish no explanation of this astonishing and shocking neglect of duty, except perhaps the explanation offered by the Senator from South Carolina, who humorously apologized for them—

That they could not be expected to furnish a rope with which to hang themselves.

Is it possible, Mr. President, that men of nobility and character, that Senators trusted by the people with such power, have knowingly refused to compile "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad" on the items of the Dingley bill for our present guidance because they intended to break faith with the American people and did not dare to make the truth manifest by compiling this damning evidence of their betrayal of their party pledges?

Whatever the purpose, Mr. President, the responsible authorities of the Senate in charge of this bill have furnished everything else except the evidence in point, and have obscured the issues both in the Senate and House by many volumes of undigested and undigestible matter, as well calculated to confuse the mind of an intelligent and laborious legislator as the huge volumes of testimony bundled before the petit jury in the criminal-rich cases, for the purpose of befogging the issue and assuring a miscarriage of justice.

In answer to my resolute demand for this information, the managers of the Senate, presenting and sustaining this bill, undertook to ridicule and discourage the inquiry. The chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. Aldrich] indulges in satire, evasion, and suggests a lack of intelligence in the inquiry. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] declares the inquiry absurd. The Senator from Montana [Mr. Carter] suggests that Senators can not expect to be fed with an intellectual spoon, and so forth. And this is the utterly contemptible and pusillanimous manner in which party pledges are redeemed. This is the answer made to a respectful inquiry, why this information is not furnished as to "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," and why this bill is not written in the light of this evidence, as the party pledged itself to do to the American people.

Mr. President, the Republican leaders in charge of this bill occupy a position absolutely and utterly indefensible. They have boldly and openly violated the pledges of the party and have sacrificed the interests of the American people to benefit those selfish interests which are using these high schedules for the purpose of sheltering monopoly.

Mr. President, I can not help but believe that the Republican leaders, acting through the subtle influence of machine politics, have been led into a support of these high schedules without fully realizing that they are violating their party pledges, which confines them to the difference of the cost of production at home and abroad, but having made the error, defend it from false pride of opinion.

They have been, not perhaps quite hypnotized, but overwhelmed with the "power of suggestion" enveloping them and creating the atmosphere and controlling environment established by a swarm of attorneys, special pleaders, and fasinating representatives of the high-tariff beneficiaries.

They seem to have entirely lost sight of the principle of protection taught by their forefathers and defended by their own platform. This bill ought not to pass.

BECAUSE IT VIOLATES THE TRUE PRINCIPLE OF LEGITIMATE PROTECTION, WHICH DOES NOT ENGENDER OR DEFEND MONOPOLY.

This bill ought not to pass, because it violates the principle of protection from beginning to end.

Mr. President, if there is one thing that ought to be more thoroughly understood than another in this country it is—

The principle of legitimate protection.

There is not the slightest doubt about what it means from the days of Alexander Hamilton to this good day. The meaning of protection is absolutely clear to all students of economy, and that is a duty under a constitutional revenue tariff, so levied as to equal "the difference in cost of production at home and abroad," and thus enable the American manufacturer to meet on equal terms the competition of the foreign manufacturer, who enjoys cheaper labor or more favorable conditions, but not to establish monopoly by prohibitive duties.

Alexander Hamilton, in his famous report on the encouragement of manufacturers, gives the reasons for this policy. It was accepted by Washington, by Jefferson, by Madison, by Andrew Jackson, and various Democratic leaders down to the days of Samuel J. Tilden and Grover Cleveland, and has not been denied, as far as I am informed, by any great Democratic leader.

The Democratic platform of 1884 vigorously declared that in reducing the tariff the reduction—

Must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country.

And the Republican platform of 1904 says:

The measure of protection should always, at least, equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

And this doctrine is repeated again in the tariff of 1908 in the following words:

The true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad.

The Republican platform of 1908, however, adds the words:

Together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

This latter is not the doctrine of protection. It is the political wedge of monopoly. It is the latest political device of those who have been fraudulently building up monopoly under color of the doctrine of protection.

The Democrats have sincerely and justly declared "Republican protection" a fraud and the shelter of monopoly. The Republicans have unjustly and deceitfully declared the Democratic tariff for revenue to be free trade.

I shall undertake, Mr. President, to show that the tariff under the doctrine for revenue would be three times as high as a tariff drawn purely for purposes of protection under the principles laid down in the Republican platform of equaling the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, if it were honestly drawn.

The Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue is not free trade or anything which approximates it. It is a tariff high enough to abundantly afford every protection to any American industry which it has an honest right to ask, as I shall immediately show.

The Democratic doctrine has been the correct one; that is, a tariff as low as economical government will permit, and not so low as to injure any legitimate industry established under our tariff system, contending that a tariff for revenue properly drawn will meet by incidental protection every legitimate demand.

I shall not pause to discuss the difference between the two parties. I shall content myself with showing that this bill does not conform to the principle of legitimate protection, absolute or incidental, laid down by either party, but under the pretense of protecting American labor and American capital legitimately employed it is written in such a manner as to utterly ignore the principles of protection as taught by the Republicans themselves. This will be perfectly obvious to any man who will take the schedules submitted under the head of "Estimated revenues of this bill," of April 12, 1909, showing the rates proposed by this present bill and the comparison of the rates with the Dingley bill.

THE DIFFERENCE IN THE COST OF PRODUCTION AT HOME AND ABROAD.

The cost of production depends on materials and labor.

Materials are as cheap in the markets of the world to the American as to the European, except as we tax import of raw material by our own statute. Our policy, with few exceptions, is to admit raw material free, so that the question of the relative cost of materials is of very small relative importance.

Our manufacturers get free raw materials for their export business by refund of duties paid.

Many materials are cheaper in the United States than they are abroad, except where controlled by our unrestrained monopolies.

LABOR COST.

Labor cost in wages in the protected industries, measured by efficiency and the purchasing power of wages paid to labor, is approximately the same in the United States as in Europe, except where the American wage earner is highly organized.

1. I shall undertake to show that this is true by showing that the money paid American labor in protected industries is approximately on an average but little more than that paid in Europe.

2. That the American workman is twice as efficient, and because of efficiency is entitled to twice the wage of the European workman, and that the difference in labor cost compared to the value of the product is in favor of the American manufacturer.

3. I shall undertake to show that $150 of wages in the United States buys only what a hundred dollars buys in Europe in manufactured goods, and for this reason the American manufacturer does not pay his labor as much in proportion to work done as the European manufacturer.

4. I shall undertake to show, finally, that the total percentage of wages to the gross product of all American manufacturers is only 17.8 per cent of the gross value of the product, and, therefore, that the difference in the cost of production in the United States and abroad must be on an average less than this percentage. If labor abroad cost half as much as in the United States, as the high protectionists pretend, then the difference in cost of production necessary to be provided for by a purely protective tariff would be less than the average of 10 per cent, while a revenue tariff would be between 30 and 40 per cent.

I shall undertake to show the bad effect of a prohibitive tariff on wages, on commerce, on distribution of wealth, and in corrupting of public and private life.

3. Effect of prohibitive tariff.

ON WAGES.

(a) Has lowered wages relative to product.
(b) Has lowered wages in protected industries compared to unprotected industries.
(c) Has lowered purchasing power of wages.
(d) Has established monopoly, and, consequently,
1. Has prevented or obstructed the organization of labor.
2. Restricted output and diminished demand for labor.
3. Has substituted foreign pauper labor for American labor.
4. Has required ruinous hours.
5. Subjected labor to bad housing, bad water, insanitary conditions.
6. Has increased mortality of labor.
7. Has destroyed political liberty of its labor in large measure.
8. Has impaired labor's commercial independence.
9. Has appropriated all the net proceeds of labor and accumulated it in the hands of the few.

ON COMMERCE.

(a) Has weakened our imports and exports.
(b) Has diminished the output of smaller factories, depending for material on monopolies.

(c) Has raised prices in United States 50 per cent above the prices abroad, thus diminishing consumption.

1. This means a ruinous tax on the man or woman with fixed income. A man with income of $1,500 has one-third of income confiscated by monopolies' high prices.

This affects all men with fixed income. The clerk, the servant, the Government employee, the pensioner, the man receiving fixed return from investment, yields one-third of it all to monopoly.

ON DISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH.

1. It has piled up enormous wealth in few hands, which now grows with accumulating force, absorbing all natural opportunities of life. The oil fields, coal, ore, timber, transportation and transmission services, municipal franchises, real estate, water powers, with the inevitable result, if not checked, of commercial mastery and commercial slavery and destruction of political independence.

2. It has corrupted our public life, our elections, our cities, our courts, legislatures, and executive officers, and our private citizens.

FIRST. RELATIVE LABOR COST.

Mr. President, I wish to point out the relative labor cost, because in considering this matter as a student, I have faithfully undertaken to do so. What I shall say will be as a student of this matter and not as a mere controversialist—and I defy the Committee on Finance to challenge the accuracy of the figures which I submit to the Senate—the labor cost of material is the first great factor that ought to be considered by the Senate. The percentage which labor bears to various products, as shown by our statistical tables, is carefully set forth in Exhibit 1, taken from volumes 7–10 on manufactures of our Federal census.

It is true that the Census Bureau neglected to work out the percentages of labor cost, but that is a mathematical problem easy of solution, to which I have given industrious attention. I call the attention of the Senate to these percentages, which are of vital importance if this bill is to be written in a spirit of integrity. From this table it appears that labor's share of the gross product in the food industries was 5.7 per cent; in textiles, 19.5 per cent; in iron and steel, 22.10 per cent; lumber, 27.4 per cent; leather industries, 16.5 per cent; in paper and printing, 21.6 per cent; in liquors and beverages, 8.9 per cent; in chemicals and allied products, 8 per cent; clay, glass, and stone products, 37.1 per cent; in metals and metal products, 12.7 per cent; tobacco products, 18.9 per cent; for vehicles for land transportation, 34.4 per cent; in shipbuilding, 35.2 per cent; in miscellaneous industries, 19.9 per cent.

The average of wages paid to labor, compared with the gross product in the 14 great industries, therefore, is only 19.7 per cent of the gross product. And yet the leaders bring in this bill with the average three times as high as the total labor cost and ask us, representing the people of the United States, to accept it without a murmur and without a protest. They have neglected to point out the difference of the cost of production at home and abroad. I have undertaken to do so, and to put upon the records of the Senate a lasting memorial of what this cost is, that they shall not leave this matter without explanation to the people of the United States. It shall be recorded and it is recorded by the tables which I shall immediately submit.

Mr. President, before I submit these tables, however, I wish to call attention to the report of Carroll D. Wright. I have suggested heretofore to the managers of this bill that they might consult the tables of Carroll D. Wright with advantage. He offers 446 different articles, with the total labor cost measured to the cent in each and every one of them, taking this information from the United States, from Germany, from Belgium, from England, and he verifies in these particular instances the accuracy of our general tables taken from the Census Bureau.

Obviously, the difference in the percentage which the wages of labor abroad would bear to manufactured products in like great industries will be somewhat similar to the percentage in this country. Wages are somewhat cheaper abroad in the protected industries than they are in this country; and if the average wage was only half abroad what it is at home, the difference in the cost of wages at home and abroad would not exceed 10 per cent ad valorem on the gross products of labor in all of our 14 great groups of manufacturing industries; but when it is remembered that American labor is twice as productive in this country as it is abroad, even this 10 per cent disappears. Notwithstanding this important and vital fact, the representatives of high protection continually declaim that a 50 per cent tariff is almost solely and exclusively in the interest of the American laborer and for the protection of the American manufacturer from bankruptcy.

THE LOWER WAGES IN EUROPE OFFSET BY GREATER EFFICIENCY OF AMERICAN LABOR.

James G. Blaine once said:

That the actual labor cost of the American product is less because the effectiveness of American labor was superior to that of the workingman of any other nation on earth.

Prof. William G. Clark, indorsed as an authority by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], in the Engineering Magazine for May, 1904, submits a table, which he bases on official data, showing the comparative productivity of American labor for the year 1900, as follows, to wit:

American, average annual output	$2,450
Canadian, average annual output	1,455
Australian, average annual output	900
French, average annual output	640
England, average annual output	556
German, average annual output	460

I do not assert that these figures are strictly correct, but believe it will be generally conceded that the American workman has at least twice the efficiency of the European workman, because of the use of superior machinery, modern appliances, and more effective invention.

PER CENT OF WAGES TO VALUE OF PRODUCT NOT CONSIDERED IN TARIFF RATES OF PENDING BILL.

The percentage which labor receives upon the gross product in the textiles industry, for example, as compiled by our own census on manufactures, is only 19.5 per cent; and yet when the woolen schedule, for example, is examined, the present bill puts yarn, 143 per cent (par. 373); knit fabrics, 141 per cent (par. 374); plushes and other pile fabrics, 141 per cent; wool advanced in any manner beyond scouring, 140 per cent; woolen cloths or worsted, 134 per cent (par. 374); blankets, 107 per cent; flannels for underwear, 143 per cent; dress goods, coat linings, and so forth, 105 per cent (par. 376); felts, not woven, 95 per cent; wearing apparel, clothes, dolman, jackets, ulsters, and so forth, for ladies and children, 80 per cent; hats of wool, 92 per cent; shawls, 92 per cent; woolen carpets, 114 per cent (par. 389).

Grossly violating the principle of protection, even from the Republican standpoint, and even in cotton cloth, which is particularly needed by our poorest people, cotton carpets are taxed 50 per cent (par. 389). Cotton cloth, 42 per cent, and as high as 61 per cent for different kinds of cotton cloth; cotton handkerchiefs, 55 per cent; cotton sleeve linings, 58 per cent.

Mr. President, the cost of labor in transforming wool and cotton into cloth is small. It does not exceed an average of 25 per cent, and in England it is slightly more than in the United States, because the labor there is not so efficient as in the United States; and the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad as far as the labor cost in cotton and woolen cloth is concerned is almost a negligible quantity.

It will not do, Mr. President, to attempt to deceive anyone by pretending that the difference in cost of production of items on this bill at home and abroad is not available, or that it would take years to compile it, as the managers of this bill have asserted on the floor of the Senate during this debate. It is available, and it has been collected on many sample products.

I had the honor to submit to the Senate, during the present session, the report of Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, of 1898, who carefully examined into this question of costs, giving the precise amounts of costs in 446 instances. And in regard to woolen goods he shows that No. 1 woolen yarn can be made at a labor cost of 5.44 per cent of the finished product (S. Doc. 20, 55th Cong., 3d sess., p. 84); that woolen yarn No. 2 could be made with a labor cost of 4.74 per cent of the finished product; that woolen yarn No. 3 could be made for 7.11 per cent of the finished product; that woolen yarn No. 4 could be made for 6.49 per cent of the finished product; that woolen yarn No. 5 could be made at a cost of 7.71 per cent of the finished product; that woolen yarn No. 6 could be made at a labor cost of 9.29 per cent of the finished product; and including the entire cost of labor in transformation materials, which are shown in No. 426, that woolen cloth in the United States, 55 inches wide, 24 ounces to the yard, can be made at a labor cost of 16.44 per cent of the finished product.

But the Committee on Finance approve a rate of 143 per cent on woolen yarn.

Mr. President, if I should point out all of such inequalities between the cost of production at home and abroad and the rates fixed by this bill, with its 4,000 items, it would require a volume and many days of time. I therefore content myself with a complete demonstration of the general character of this bill in its indifference to the principles of protection as laid down in the Republican platform, and will then proceed with other considerations.

I take a few items from Carroll D. Wright's report, giving the cost of labor in transforming wool into blankets in the United States, compiled by him under the instructions of the Senate 10 years ago, and of woolen cloth.

He explains that this work was obtained directly from the manufacturers by the Department of Labor, using "experts from the department detailed for that purpose."

He shows the total cost of labor in blankets, cloth, and woolen yarns to be from 5 per cent to 30 per cent.

[From report of Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, 1898, by experts on cost, in answer to Senate resolution.]

CENSUS TABLES, SHOWING PERCENTAGE OF LABOR TO VALUE OF PRODUCT IN COST OF PRODUCTION.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I submit the following tables, taken from Table 156 of the Abstract of the Census of 1900, relative to 15 groups of industries. While these tables can not be called microscopically exact, they certainly comprise the best evidence available to show the relative return to labor and to capital affected by the tariff, and in so far as they lack precision are more favorable to capital than to labor, because these figures were obtained from the reports of manufacturing establishments controlled by capital, and the evidences, therefore, are out of the mouths of the manufacturers themselves, but are based on watered stocks, and cover returns to capital contained in salaries and miscellaneous items which can not be determined.

These tables which I shall submit will show the capital alleged to be invested in 1890, 1900, and 1905, with the expenses, including salaries of officers, amounts paid in wages, amounts paid under the head of "Miscellaneous," and the amount paid for "materials," with the value of the product and the profit, showing the percentage of profit to capital and the percentage paid to labor out of the proceeds of labor, and the percentage of wages to the increase of value by manufacture.

I have been compelled to make these compilations, and am indebted for the caluculations to Mr. Josiah H. Shinn, of Washington, a statistical expert of high standing, and to Mr. J. J. McCoy, Actuary of the United States Treasury. The Census Bureau neglected to point out in its tables the comparative reward of capital and labor, and I have done so, in order to show the truth with regard to it.

Neither the Committee on Finance nor the Committee on Ways and Means in the House has seen fit to furnish this information to the country, and yet only in this direction and by like methods and tables can be determined "the difference in cost of labor or of production at home and abroad" on which this tariff bill is falsely pretended to be drawn.

The percentage of labor is worked out in every one of the great tables affecting the 14 groups of industries in the United States from details gathered with infinite care from the manufacturer himself, and are therefore as favorable to him as they might naturally be expected to be. A very interesting ratio of the relative wages is found in these tables; that is to say, that under this high prohibitive tariff, engendering monopolies, the result has followed which might be expected to follow—that labor continually receives a diminishing share of that which it produces. For instance, taking the textile industry, in 1890 labor received 22 per cent of the gross product; in 1902 it received 20.8 per cent of the gross product; and in 1905 it received 19.5 per cent. So it will be found all through these tables that the monopolies which have been built up upon these tariffs have gradually diminished the part which labor receives.

Look at these wonderful tables, showing the profits of the various manufacturers of the country by groups of industries. Remember the enormous stock-watering operations shown by Moody's Manual and by Poor's Manual and the corporation statistics of the last 15 years, and then consider what it means when this watered capital on food products pays 16.4 per cent interest, with a fairly estimated profit, considering water, of 32 per cent; on textiles, of 12 per cent, which fairly estimated profit of 24 per cent; on iron and steel, of 10.6 per cent, which would be probably 30 per cent; on lumber, of 18.7 per cent, and probably of nearly 50 per cent; on the industries of leather, 13.5 per cent, when it should be at least three times that; and so all through the list.

These monopolies are shown to have the certain enormous rates of profits which these tables point out. These tables necessarily include a multitude of companies whose profits are reasonable and just in every respect, who are not monopolistic, who are doing business on a fair competitive market, so that the profits of monopoly are the special profits which swell this total to a high figure, and which stand above, and far above, the averages which are given. When there is also taken into consideration the fact that on a physical valuation they would not have probably one-third of the capital invested which they pretend to have by their capital stock; when it is remembered that under the head of salaries and miscellaneous expenses and other artful methods of bookkeeping the earnings of these monopolies are being secretly used and concealed and being invested in various forms of property, it is no exaggeration to say that the earnings on physical valuation are probably three times what they appear to be on the face of the census reports.

Mr. President, I call the attention of Senators in considering these tables and invite them to remember that since 1890 the United States has gone through the most remarkable stock-watering operation that the civilized world has ever seen. And the earning power of labor and of public franchises has been capitalized in a multitude of monopolies, which have been established by combining competing enterprises into single companies, so that, while the capital of 1890 was in a large measure watered stock, it is probably no exaggeration to say that the capital of 1905 will average probably 66 per cent of "water"; so that when you consider the percentage of profit on the capital in these tables it should be at least doubled and should be probably trebled to give a fair estimate.

Another item which should be kept in mind is that the men who control corporate organizations can allow themselves such enormous rewards under the head of salaries that this item is also an important additional item in favor of capital. With this explanation, it will be seen that labor's share of the return of the work done in this aggregate group of all the great industries relating to manufactured products is very small, and after supplying the necessaries of life leaves labor no surplus. The profit of capital, confessedly, is 16.4 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, I submit a tabulated abstract showing the profits of capital conceded; also a table of estimated profits and a table of probable profits in the 14 great groups of our national industries.

THE MEANING OF WORDS USED IN THE TABLES.

Salaries.—Covers the salaries of officials, salesmen, bookkeepers, clerks, stenographers; in some cases superintendents and foremen.

Wages.—The word "wages" means the wages of workingmen.

Miscellaneous.—Means (see Special Report of Census, Manufactures, vol. 1, 1905, p. xcix):

1. Amount paid for rent of factory or works.
2. Amount paid for taxes, not including internal revenue.
3. Amount paid for rent of offices and buildings other than factory or works, and for interest, insurance, internal-revenue tax, ordinary repairs of buildings and machinery, advertising, traveling expenses, and all other sundry expenses not reported under the head of "Materials."

Materials.—The word "materials," page cl, means:

1. Cost of components of the product.
2. Cost of fuel, oil, and waste.
3. Packing boxes, and materials to make them.
4. Wrapping paper.
5. Freights paid by the manufacturers.
6. Rent of power and heat.

The salaried officials include the administration force, whether of sales, manufacturing, purchasing, advertising, or mail orders (p. lxxiv).

For full details see Exhibit I. Average rate of wages to gross product in all industries, 17.8 per cent, calculating from table of totals of wages and value of products.

RELATIVE LABOR COST.

Mr. OWEN. The first important deduction shown from these tables is the relative cost of labor as compared with the gross product. It is less than 6 per cent in food products, and yet the tariff on food products is an average of 32 per cent, in order to measure the cost of difference at home and abroad.

The total labor cost in textiles is 19.5 per cent, and yet the tariff in this bill on flax manufactures is over 44 per cent, on cotton manufactures over 47 per cent, on wool manufactures over 58 per cent, and on silk manufactures over 60 per cent to measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad; a patent and ridiculous fraud on its face, which has not been explained, which will not be explained, and which can not be explained by the managers of this bill, and so it goes all through this table.

The total percentage of the value of the product paid in wages in textiles is 19.5 per cent.

If we concede that the labor cost in Europe is absolutely nothing; if we concede that the foreigner would not have to pay any freight to bring his goods to America, would pay nothing for ocean insurance, for breakage, wharfage, dockage, leakage, rattage, or stenlage, still 19.5 per cent would be high enough to protect the American manufacturer on an average.

Granting, however, that the European laborer earns half as much, then one-half of 19.5 per cent would be sufficient.

Granting that the American laborer has twice the efficiency of the European laborer, then no tariff whatever is necessary to protect the American manufacturer; and granting that the wages paid in Europe buy more of manufactured products and as much of food products as in America, the European manufacturer would be entitled to a bonus from his home government to put him on a parity with the American manufacturer.

In some cases a duty is necessary for protective purposes, but the cases are few and the rate not high. A tariff for revenue intelligently drawn will be more than three times as high as a tariff for pure protection drawn in a spirit of perfect honesty.

If the Finance Committee can show any justification for the schedules on the basis of the "difference of the cost of production at home and abroad," I am willing to concede this measure of incidental protection under a tariff for revenue, but to conceal the facts, to refuse to hear, to ridicule the inquiry, and ignore the facts when proven is surely indefensible.

This abstract briefly exhibits the ratio of wages to gross products and affords a basis of comparison with the ratio of wages to gross products in countries competing with ours. This supplies a basis for a generalization showing the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

It will be seen, for example, that the average ratio of wages paid to the gross product in the textile industry averages 19.5 per cent—less than 20 per cent. The difference in the wage cost in the United States and abroad, conceding that the foreign workman receives a wage only half of that paid the American workman and conceding that he is equally efficient and conceding that his wages (half in money) has a purchasing power of half the wages of the American workman, the difference in the cost of production based on such wages would be an average of less than 10 per cent.

But it is not true that the wages paid foreign workmen buys only half as much, but the fact is that every dollar paid the foreign workman buys at least 50 per cent more than the dollar paid the American workman, so that $10 paid an European workman is equivalent to $15 in purchasing power in the United States.

So that the difference in the amount paid in wages because of this factor as compared to the value of the gross product is less than an average of 10 per cent, as above estimated.

Another factor of vital importance is the superior efficiency of the American workman. Ten dollars paid to him turns out twice as much goods as that paid the European workman; consequently the difference in wages compared to gross product is not only not against the American workman but it is in his favor, although he does not get the benefit of it from the man who employs him.

It is not surprising, in view of these calculations based upon our national statistics and well-established facts, that the managers in charge of this bill dare not answer the question whether this bill is being written in accordance with the pledge of the party that the rates should be determined by the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

The monopolist can not and does not consume his profit. So that the result is that the capital of monopoly is rolling up like a huge snowball, picking up every opportunity offered by God to mankind in our natural resources—the forests, the mines, the waterpowers, the highways, and the land, both of city and of the countryside; and labor, the creator of wealth, languishes and grows weaker as the creature of wealth grows stronger and exercises a natural but unrestrained appetite by "acquiring" the title to every visible and invisible natural resource.

Mr. President, I am a firm friend of capital and always ready to befriend its just rights. I believe in giving it safety and stability, protecting it in its right to earn a fair reward upon its employment. It is of great importance that the incentive should be removed neither from the capitalist nor from the business man who uses capital nor from the laborer who is employed by capital, but I do not believe that all of the net proceeds of human labor and every opportunity of human life should be appropriated by capital and all the reasonable opportunities of life cut off from millions of wage earners who have no more wisdom or knowledge of how to protect themselves against the crafty schemes of monopoly than if they were so many blind girl babies. The Senate and the Senators on this floor, it seems to me, are under a solemn personal responsibility to find the way to protect the weaker elements of society, and they ought not to write the laws of this country to serve monopoly at the expense of the defenseless citizen wage earner.

The incentive ought not to be taken away from capital; neither should the incentive be taken away from the small business man who may be crushed by gigantic organizations of capital, and above all the incentive of a reasonable reward, of a reasonable return for labor, of the power to support a family by labor, industry, and providence. The power to have some leisure for playtime should not be taken away from the American workingman or the American working woman or the American working child by the grinding process of unthinking corporate monopoly.

Under the head of "Miscellany" are concealed many items favorable to capital by increasing the capital itself under color of repairs, and so forth.

The estimate of the profit on capital is also too small, because more than half of the capital claimed is water.

All of the return on capital, except a small percentage, necessary to provide for a reasonable return on capital, is a net profit, while the return on labor contains no net profit worth mentioning, although it is true that by long, hard hours of labor, great deprivation, rigid economy, and careful saving, the labor classes, through the savings banks exhibit a considerable accumulation out of the proceeds of their labor.

Statistics of the savings banks of the United States for 1906.

[Comptroller Currency Report, 1907.]

	Total depositors.	Amount of deposits.	Average.
New England	2,987,261	$1,168,148,705	$391.04
Eastern States	3,562,804	1,656,905,727	405.06
Southern States	31,598	6,143,167	194.41
Middle States	1,087,746	385,503,885	354.41
Pacific States	357,782	265,435,714	741.89
Total United States	8,027,192	3,482,137,198	433.79

The savings under 40 years of high protective tariff average $433.79 to those who have been able to save, and these figures include hundreds of millions of the savings of the well-to-do and many of the capital class; but only one person in ten, after all, has a savings account, and the savings between the laboring people and actual want will not average $43 per capita for our entire productive population, counting all savings as the savings of labor, while many millions are utterly defenseless against the exactions of capital.

When it is remembered what the enormous product of the labor of the average American workman is—$2,500 per annum—it will be observed that these savings of many years comprise but a small part of the proceeds of labor.

In the table exhibited—the industries engaged in "food products"—labor's share of the gross product is very small, because of the very large amount of raw material used, out of which labor had previously been paid in the process of production.

The same thing is relatively true of the industries dealing with liquors and beverages.

It is also true that labor's share in lumber and iron and steel, and clay, glass, and stone products, and in vehicles and shipbuilding reaches a high percentage relative to the product, for the simple reason that nearly all of the value in lumber outside of the stumpage is pure labor. Labor goes into the woods, cuts the tree down, hauls it to the mill, puts it on the runway, saws the log, planes it, stacks the lumber, and puts the lumber on the car. Capital, having acquired the land, furnishes the sawmill, and permits labor to have a part of its own profits in wages, but no more than labor can command in a free, competitive market for labor.

The same thing is true with regard to clay products. The workman digs the clay out of the ground, puts it through every process with the work of his hands, and converts it into a finished product. Capital, having acquired the title to the clay, permits the workmen to dig upon the earth owned by the capitalist, and furnishes the workmen with tools, and pays the workmen precisely as much, and no more, as his labor commands in a free, competitive labor market.

The laborer has a very narrow margin, and unless he be exceptional in self-denial, in providence, and is free from accident or sickness or other incidental loss, he may perhaps save enough to lift himself from the severe conditions which so environ him to a more fortunate place, where he can join the capital class and get the benefits of a system which is well devised to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

THE HIGH TARIFF HAS LOWERED THE WAGES OF AMERICAN WORKMEN.

Mr. President, the advocates of a high tariff have always professed, and I suppose usually felt, the greatest solicitude for the welfare of the laboring man, and have believed, or appeared to believe, that a high tariff would protect the American laboring man against the injurious competition of the "pauper labor" of Europe. I shall show by our own statistics that the wages of the American workman have been lowered under the operation of this tariff.

Wages are not valued alone by dollars and cents; dollars change in purchasing power, depending on the number of dollars put in circulation in any given country and the intimacy of its commercial relations with other countries, and the whole world is confused in the question of prices by the grossly unequal distribution of currency in the different nations of the world; a great problem, which is now undergoing and will undergo a more rapid readjustment under the fast increasing improvement of rapid modern intercourse.

Attention is expressly called to the fact that labor's share of the proceeds of labor has not increased in the highly protected industries—it has decreased.

In the textile industries labor received 22 per cent of the gross product in 1890, 20.8 in 1900, and 19.5 in 1905.

In iron and steel labor received 24.9 per cent in 1890 and 22.1 per cent in 1905.

In leather goods labor received 21.1 per cent of the proceeds of labor in 1890, 16.9 per cent in 1900, and 16.5 per cent in 1905.

In paper and printing labor received 26.5 per cent of the proceeds of labor in 1890, 23.1 per cent in 1900, 21.6 per cent in 1905.

In chemical and allied products labor received 8.9 per cent in 1890, 8 per cent in 1905.

In clay, glass, and stone products labor received 39.3 per cent in 1890, 37.1 per cent in 1900.

In metal and metal products, other than iron and steel, labor received 20.4 per cent in 1890 and 12.7 per cent in 1905.

In tobacco labor received 21 per cent in 1890 and 18.9 per cent in 1905.

In shipbuilding labor received 36.7 per cent in 1890 and 35.2 per cent in 1905.

In miscellaneous industries labor received 21.1 per cent in 1890 and 19.9 per cent in 1905.

It is perfectly obvious that under the high tariff the reward of labor has diminished relatively to the gross product of labor.

When we compare the increase of the value of products, the increase of the cost of materials, and the number of wage earners, and the total wages between 1890 and 1900, we find that the growth of capital value corresponding with that of the value of products is decidedly more than the increase of total wages; that the average wage for all classes of wage earners, in dollars and cents, is less in 1900 than in 1890. The increase of earnings is 25 per cent; that of wages only a little over 22 per cent.

	Capital value.	Value of products.	Cost of materials.	Number of wage earners.	Total wages.	Average value, product of the wage earner.	Per cent.
1900	$9,813,834,390	$13,000,149,159	$7,343,627,875	5,306,143	$2,320,938,168	$2,450	17.8
1890	6,525,050,759	9,372,378,843	5,162,013,878	4,251,535	1,891,953,795	2,204	20.2
Increase	3,288,783,631	3,627,770,316	2,181,613,997	1,054,608	428,984,373	.....	.....

Nineteen hundred average wage, $437; annual weekly wage, $8.60, to support 3 people, a labor loss of 10 per cent in wages relative to value of product.

The percentage of wages to value of products was 17.8 per cent in 1900, 20.2 per cent in 1890, a loss for labor of 10 per cent.

Here is an increase of $3,627,740,316 in the value of the products of labor under the "value of products," and $428,984,373 goes to 1,054,608 additional laborers, while $3,198,755,943 is the net value of the products of such labor. One million fifty-four thousand six hundred and eight new workmen get $428,984,373 with which to sustain approximately 3,000,000 people; to feed, clothe, and shelter them; leaving no surplus for enforced idleness, sickness, accident, or death; and a vast profit goes to capital that does not have the same exacting demands for food and clothing. The annual weekly wage is only $8.60 to support three people. How does this compare with Europe, where the dollar buys 50 per cent more, and $8.60 here is only equal to $5.73 there? Look at their wages, their earning power, and ask what is the difference in the cost of production here and there. Do these census records teach us nothing?

The above figures demonstrate beyond the possibility of dispute that wages are being lowered under the operation of a monopoly-protecting tariff. It shows more, that a tariff averaging nearly 50 per cent is thoroughly unjustifiable on the Republican theory of protecting labor, since the gross amount of labor's wages only comprises an average of 19.7 per cent of gross product value (Exhibit I), much less on the theory of providing only the "difference in the cost of labor," since the difference in the cost of labor will not approximate 20 per cent nor equal the half of it.

The plain truth is the bill will not protect labor, but will gratify the clamorous demand of organized greed and avarice urged by the lobby of numerous monopolies. This tariff, in the pretended interest of the American workman, does not properly include over 1,000,000 out of 29,000,000 workmen, while it taxes all.

It has been convincingly shown by Edward Atkinson, in his learned report of December, 1902 (Exhibit 2), that not over 1,000,000 persons out of 29,000,000 persons would be affected in an adverse way if the tariff were absolutely abolished. This calculation, made in great detail, goes far to show the utterly false pretense of a great public demand for a high protective or prohibitive tariff. Attention is earnestly called to it in Senate Document No. 46, Sixty-first Congress, first session, from which I submit the essential part as Exhibit 2.

THE HIGH TARIFF HAS LOWERED THE WAGES OF AMERICAN WORKMEN IN PROTECTED INDUSTRIES MORE THAN THE WAGES OF WORKMEN IN UNPROTECTED INDUSTRIES.

I submit as Exhibit 3 a carefully compiled table of the labor wages of our American railways (Statistics of Railroads in United States, 1907, Interstate Commerce Commission, p. 59), showing the wages of railroad employees in the unprotected industries of the railroad service, and also a table of the wages of employees in building trades, which are not protected, but which are duly organized, prepared by William J. Spencer, secretary of the building-trade department of the American Federation of Labor, for 1908 (Exhibit 4), showing the average wages of masons and bricklayers, structural iron setters, ornamental iron setters, plasterers, lathers, hoisting engineers, tile setters, plumbers, steam fitters, steam fitters' helpers, gas fitters, carpenters, stonecutters, marble cutters and setters, painters, sheet metal workers, electricians, roofers, cement finishers, laborers, and hod carriers. Their wages per hour will be seen to be, on an average, at least twice as high as the wages of labor in protected industries (Exhibit 5), as shown by Census Bulletin 77 of the Bureau of Labor of 1907.

Mr. President, here will be seen that the cheapest workmen (Exhibit 3) in the railroad service, for brakemen, received an average throughout the United States for 1907, $1.46 a day; section foremen, $1.90; other shopmen, $2.06; carpenters, $2.40; machinists, $2.87; firemen and other trainmen, $2.54; conductors, $3.69; engineer men, $4.30; station agents, $2.05; general office clerks, $2.30; other officers, $5.99; general officers, $11.93. These wages in unprotected industries are decent, are reasonable, are just according to service, in the transportation work of the United States. These people have their wages influenced to an important degree by labor organization.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact—and a vital fact in this matter—that in the protected industries of the United States the wage-earner does not receive one-half as much as in the unprotected industries, and these tables abundantly exhibit it.

Exhibit No. 4 shows that masons and bricklayers get from 45 to 87 cents an hour; structural iron setters, 30 to 62 cents an hour; ornamental iron setters, 30 to 70 cents an hour; plasterers, 50 to 87½ cents an hour; lathers, 45 to 62½ cents an hour; hoisting engineers, 50 to 75 cents an hour; tile setters, 35 to 75 cents an hour; plumbers, 50 to 75 cents an hour; steam fitters, 35 to 75 cents an hour; steam fitters' helpers, 15 to 37½ cents an hour; gas fitters, 35 to 81 cents an hour; carpenters, 35 to 62½ cents an hour; stonecutters, 45 to 70 cents an hour; marble cutters and marble setters, 30 to 62½ cents an hour; painters, 25 to 56 cents an hour; sheet metal workers, 30 to 62½ cents an hour; electricians, 25 to 65 cents an hour; roofers, 25 to 75 cents an hour; cement finishers, 35 to 75 cents an hour; laborers and hod carriers, 15 to 50 cents an hour.

Mr. President, these people are outside of the protected industries; they have some degree of organization and can demand the value from capital for their labor.

The laws of human nature operate upon the laboring man precisely as they do upon the capitalist, and he tries to get the greatest return for his wares. Labor organizations have sometimes gone to extremes and put the price of labor above a reasonable market value and lowered the demand to the point of putting themselves out of business. The urgency of labors' need for supplying food and clothing is an extenuating circumstance even when the demand itself is unreasonable and foolish; but when the demand of monopoly puts an exorbitant price upon the necessaries of life its motive is not hunger for food or need for clothing or shelter for children, but merely ambition for power or mere greed for gain.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the astonishing difference between the wages of men in unprotected industries with the wages in the "protected industries," so called, and you will observe that the wages in the protected industries, except where modified by a powerful organization of the laborers, as in the glass industry, are far below the wages in unprotected industries. Organized capital has beaten down the wages of labor to a point at which the proper support of a family required by a decent American standard is often impossible. This meanness on the part of such offending manufacturers is painfully apparent.

THE PROTECTED INDUSTRIES HAVE DRIVEN OUT THE AMERICAN AND SUBSTITUTED THE FOREIGNER.

It has resulted in driving out the native American who was able to escape and has substituted in his place the oppressed people of other races, who, having been under the grinding monopoly of the landed nobility and powers which have seized every opportunity in European countries, do not feel so keenly the crushing conditions imposed upon them in these offending factories.

I call attention to the low wages which are paid in the protected industries, so low as not to be sufficient to sustain an American family upon the wages of the head of the family, who may be devoting all his time to that purpose. The average wage in the cotton and wool industry will not exceed a dollar a day, and that is shown by our census tables, which I submit.

Now, Mr. President, the protected industries have driven out the American and substituted the foreigner. We have been listening for years to talk about the protection of American labor against the pauper labor of Europe; and yet our census shows how shallow and how hollow that pretension is. I call your attention to what is shown by our census.

The Boston Traveler in the article of June 2, 1909, ridicules the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and says:

> He made an impassioned plea for the mill operatives of New England, who "must not be deprived of their right to work for wages," and for the manufacturers, who must be protected against "cheap labor abroad." The mill operatives, for whom the Nahant Senator's eloquence was unloosed, are practically all Greeks, Syrians, Poles, Armenians, and Italians, who have driven out every other kind of labor, because, under present wages in the cotton mills, to bring up a family under American conditions is absolutely impossible * * *
> Mr. LODGE's defense of the cotton manufacturers, whose mills are filled with aliens on starvation wages, is paralleled in history only by the arguments made in Parliament at the time England was attempting to abolish the slave trade, that if the bringing of black people from Africa to America and elsewhere was prohibited shipowners would not find any use for their vessels, and that these slave ships furnished the only market for decayed fish and other putrid food, on which there would be a dead loss if the slave trade was outlawed.

The Pittsburg Survey gives a tabulated map showing that the Carnegie mills at Homestead, from which organized labor was driven by private armed military power in the Homestead riots, is filled with Slovaks, 6,477 of them; with Poles, 611 in number; with Bohemians and Germans, in another group; with Croatians, 1,249 in number; with Hungarians, 1,323 in number; with Roumanians, 410 in number; with Poles, 1,644 in number; with Lithuanians, 476 in number. Austria-Hungary furnished 10,421; Russia, 2,577; and so forth.

Representatives on behalf of these monopolies make "impassioned appeals" to protect the American workman against the foreign pauper labor which the monopolies have imported and are using wholesale with the effect of driving the native American to despair.

Mr. President, examine the census of 1900, volume 1, pages cxxxi and 698, on population, and see what it exhibits.

Table of foreign born, etc.

Census 1900, Volume I.	Foreign born (cxxxi).	White population foreign parentage (p. 698).	Total foreign born and of foreign-born parentage.	Total population.	Percentage of population foreign born and of foreign-born parentage.
Massachusetts	846,324	897,386	1,743,710	2,805,346	62.1
Rhode Island	134,519	140,292	274,811	428,556	64.1
Connecticut	238,210	282,245	520,455	908,420	57.3
New York	1,900,425	2,415,845	4,316,270	7,268,894	59.3
New Jersey	431,831	556,294	988,125	1,883,669	52.4
Pennsylvania	985,250	1,430,028	2,415,278	6,302,115	38.3

It will be seen by the table which I submit that Massachusetts has 1,743,710 persons foreign born or of foreign-born parentage out of 2,805,346 total population, having, therefore, 62.1 per cent of people who are foreign born or of foreign-born parentage; Rhode Island, in like manner, has 64.1 per cent of its population foreign born or of foreign-born parentage; Connecticut has 57.3 per cent of foreign born or of foreign-born parentage; New York has 59.3 per cent of its people foreign born or of foreign-born parentage; New Jersey has 52.4 per cent of its population foreign born or of foreign-born parentage, thus disclosing in the completest manner the extent to which this use of foreign labor has driven out the American.

Mr. KEAN. What is the date of that?

Mr. OWEN. The last census of 1900, to which I invite the Senator's prayerful attention.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will be glad to have the Senator give, if he has them, the figures of the percentage of foreign born as distinguished from their children.

Mr. OWEN. I have it, Mr. President, in the table which I submit, giving the exact details.

I call attention to this matter because too much has been said in behalf of protecting the American laborer and keeping out the pauper labor of Europe. The pauper labor of Europe to-day fills the very factories of these protected monopolies, and those same pauper laborers of Europe are coming into this country at the rate of 100,000 a month. It is time that this hypocrisy should cease.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator the statistics for the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. OWEN. The statistics will be found in the same tables to which I have referred.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has them not at hand?

Mr. OWEN. Not at hand. I have them available, but not so as to easily read them.

I will say that, of course, on the eastern coast, with our country inviting foreigners into this land, we should expect a large percentage; and I do not speak that in any sense of reproach to those States. I, for one, am not at all in favor of closing our ports by any tax upon these poor souls who seek a refuge in our land from a monopoly which is worse by far than that which we endure. I invite them, and bid them God-speed and welcome. This Republic is under the deepest obligations to those who have come from abroad and to their children. I honor them, and I am glad, as one American, to give them a cordial welcome. I wish they were better paid; and when they go West and enter the fields of the West perhaps they will find conditions more congenial to human life and more profitable and beneficial to them.

Mr. President, I am glad to see America, the land of liberty, made an asylum for the oppressed of other lands, and recognize the fact that the United States is under enormous obligations to people who have come from foreign lands, and I only call attention to these figures to show that the plea of the monopolies that they are deeply concerned about high wages for the American workman is so offensively hypocritical and absurd that no words known to the English language are capable of describing it.

I have submitted Table 5, showing the wages of workmen in American industries; and I call your attention to the fact that, except where they are organized, they are on almost starvation wages. The papers were full a few days ago of the slavery of white women brought into these protected factories from Italy, sold by their kinspeople, and all their wages practically taken for their keep and to pay to the foreign home—a substantial exhibition of white slavery under the color of freedom and under the protection of the American flag, which ought not to endure slavery either of the white man or the black man.

WAGES IN PROTECTED INDUSTRIES LOWER THAN IN UNPROTECTED INDUSTRIES.

I respectfully submit a table (Exhibit 5) showing the wages of workmen in the protected industries of every class—in the industry of making carpets; of clothing; cotton goods; foundry and machine shops; furniture; glass; fur hats; hosiery and knit goods; iron and steel, bar, and iron and steel, Bessemer; iron and steel, blast furnace; lumber, paper, and wood pulp; pottery; printing and binding; shipbuilding; silk goods; woolen and worsted goods. I have indicated in every case in these tables the condition of labor organization.

It will be seen by the tables of Exhibit No. 5, in the grouped industries, for example, that in 1907 burlers got 14 cents an hour; dyers, 16 cents an hour; loom fixers (who must be men of a high class), 28 cents an hour; spoolers, 13 cents an hour; twisters, 12 cents an hour; weavers, Wilton (high-class experts), 30 cents an hour; weavers, ingrain, 15 cents an hour; winders, 13 cents an hour; and, except where the workmen must be trained experts, their wages are very low.

Buttonhole makers (female), 12 to 14 cents an hour; examiners (female), 11 to 14 cents an hour; finishers, 10 to 13 cents an hour; pressers (male), 19 to 26 cents an hour; sewing-machine operators, 22 to 31 cents an hour; carding-machine tenders, 10 to 13 cents an hour; dyers, 11 to 15 cents an hour; loom fixers, 16 to 24 cents an hour; spinners, 9 to 13 cents an hour; spinners (female), 7 to 12 cents an hour; weavers (male), 11 to 19 cents an hour; weavers (female), 9 to 16 cents an hour; bleachers, 13 cents an hour; calenderers, 14 cents an hour; color mixers, 14 cents an hour.

In the hat business colorers get 19 cents an hour; fitters, 12 cents an hour; flower blowers, 17 cents an hour; trimmers, 15 cents an hour; weighers, 13 cents an hour.

Silk goods.—Beamers get 19 cents an hour; doublers, 11 cents an hour; dyers, 19 cents an hour; loom fixers, 27 cents an hour; pickers, 12 cents an hour; quillers, 9 cents an hour; spinners, 10 cents an hour; weavers, female, 10 cents an hour; weavers, female, 17 cents an hour.

Woolen goods.—Burlers get 11 cents an hour; carders, 12 cents an hour; card strippers, 13 cents an hour; combers, 12 cents an hour; combers, female, 9 cents an hour; dyers, 15 cents an hour; loom fixers (experts), 26 cents an hour; male spinners, 11 cents an hour; male weavers (expert), 21 cents an hour; female weavers (expert), 18 cents an hour.

It must be remembered that these figures, low as they are, are not uniformly paid; that the laborer who misses an hour from sickness or weakness, or who is thrown out of employment by the closing of the shop for repairs or for any other reason, must then rely upon his accumulation in savings out of the wages paid. The matter which I wish to call attention to is that under the pretense of protecting the American workman in protected industries, the most of whom are foreigners, they are paid only about half of the wages that workmen received in unprotected industries, and with these pretenses of "passionate interests" in the American workman is an unspeakable fraud which ought not to be endured by men who regard this matter soberly and seriously from a standpoint of patriotism and the better interests of the American Republic.

A great advantage which men have who are organized and not in the "protected industries," so called, is that they no longer submit to the long, grinding, sweat-shop hours, but have an eight-hour day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator kindly inform me in what part of the country the wages are paid that he has just read?

Mr. OWEN. Table No. 5, which I submit with this matter, shows the wages paid in different parts of the country.

THE ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN WORKMEN.

Mr. President, I have been gratified to observe the growing organization of workingmen, which is steadily advancing in the United States. Only by such organization and by the solidarity of their interests can labor make effective its righteous hope for a decent market for its wares; only in this way can men, under present conditions of organized capital, obtain a fair return for their labor.

It is true that sometimes the unwise members in certain labor organizations compel their leaders to stand for wages "higher than the traffic will bear," and in this case they throw themselves out of employment and are thus compelled to be more moderate in their demands. It is true that sometimes thoughtless men force their leaders into gross error and compel them to make demands that are unreasonable, but all men make errors, and all men are unreasonable at times, and these things are self-correcting.

Examine these tables which I submit, and you will observe that just in degree as they are organized just in that degree do they receive proper compensation and obtain decent hours.

They deserve the greatest credit for what they have done in obtaining the eight-hour rule among the organized trades and in promoting legislation to protect labor and to promote its interest. If Congress had heretofore seen more clearly its duty, their organization would have been in large measure unnecessary.

Shall the organization of labor be condemned because of the thoughtless or even criminal act of some occasional individuals out of this vast army? It would be as reasonable to condemn the church because of the sins of its occasional members. The organization of labor stands in the main for good order, for respect to law, for patriotism, for the upbuilding of our country, for the preservation of human life and a decent reward to those who perform the hardest labors of life and bear the sweat and dust, exposure and danger, of life's hard places.

These great organizations are a bulwark to society and stand for the future stability and preservation of our institutions, while their chief antagonists, the captains of monopoly, who, I trust, will soon be led by public opinion to better methods, have been often misled by avarice and greed, have been thus blinded to their duty toward the working people, and are blindly pursuing a policy whose results constitute a menace to the stability of our present peaceful progress.

I think the less of the management of the United States Steel, and of the American Tobacco Co., and of the Sugar Trust, and the Cramp shipbuilding yards, and others, that they have so opposed organized labor that no member of organized labor can be employed by these monopolies.

Prof. John R. Commons, of the University of Wisconsin (vol. 2, Publications of the American Sociological Society, p. 141), says:

> The unions have practically disappeared from the trusts, and are disappearing from the large corporation as they grow large enough to specialize minutely their labor. The organized workmen are found in the small establishments like the building trades or the fringe of independents on the skirts of the trusts; on the railways where skill and responsibility are not yet displaced by division of labor; in the mines where strike breakers can not be shipped in; on the docks and other places where they hold a strategic position.

Aaron Jones, Esq., master of the National Grange, November 11, 1903, at Rochester, N. Y., said:

> Combinations and trust methods in the sale of supplies and in the purchase of the products of the farm have in previous addresses been set out. A striking and forceful illustration of these methods and their effect on both the producer and the consumer is furnished by the market reports of meats. October 10, 1902, market reports show that in one of the leading live-stock markets of the country the price of hogs has been lowered during the year 30 per cent and the price of pork raised 10 per cent. These manipulations add 40 per cent profit to the meat trust, taking 30 per cent from the farmer and 10 per cent from the consumer. Beef steers in the hands of farmers were reduced 20 per cent and dressed beef raised 10 per cent, thus adding 30 per cent profit to the trust and taking 20 per cent from the farmer and 10 per cent from the consumer. More than $150,000,000 has been lost to the live-stock industry in the past year by the manipulations of the Meat Trust. This may in a measure explain how the Meat Trust may contribute $50,000 to place the official management of a single city under obligations to it If the entire product of the farm—wheat, corn, hay, cotton, live stock, dairy, and fruit—is taken into account, farmers have lost more than $700,000,000 in the past year through manipulations of combines and trusts, and because farmers have not developed and maintained a wise, safe, and well-guarded business system of selling the products of the farm. Farmers have also suffered another great loss in the purchase of supplies needed in this business.

Monopolies prefer unorganized labor; they prefer that labor should be helpless and incapable of making effective any demand for its comfort or convenience, or for its rights.

The law should firmly and unhesitatingly demand and require of labor, organized or unorganized, strict obedience to the law; but it should also demand and require of monopoly considerate and decent treatment of labor and of its rights both as producer and consumer.

The tables indicating the wages of working people in high-tariff industries are taken from Bulletin No. 77 of the United States Bureau of Labor for 1907.

I call upon the chairman of the Committee on Finance to explain the astonishing parallel between the low rate of wages paid to people in protected industries and the high wages paid those in industries not protected.

What satisfactory explanation can the Senator from Rhode Island offer for the difference in the pay of masons and bricklayers, who receive 60 cents an hour in Boston, and the burler in the carpet factory receiving 14 cents; the dyer, 16 cents, the loom fixer, 28 cents; the spooler, 13 cents; the twister, 12 cents; the weaver of Brussels and Wilton, 30 cents; the weavers of ingrain, 16 cents; and the winders, 13 cents an hour?

How does the Senator from Rhode Island explain why the plasterer receives 60 cents an hour in Boston and the workers in cotton goods can not possibly receive half as much, and do not average one-third as much?

In good old Boston the plasterer gets 60 cents an hour; the tile setter gets 60 cents an hour; the plumber, 55 cents an hour; the steam fitter, 53 cents; the stonecutter, 50 cents; the carpenter, 40 cents; the marble cutter, 56 cents; and side by side with these unprotected industries the carding-machine tender in the cotton goods protected industry receives 13 cents; the dyers, 15 cents; the loom fixers, 24 cents; the spinners, 13 and 14 cents; the mule spinners, 24 cents; the weavers, 20 cents; the female weavers, 17 cents; the bleachers, 14 cents; the color mixers, 14 cents; the male dyers, 15 cents; the male engravers, 45 cents; the male printers, 44 cents; and this remarkable comparison is most striking all the way through these tables, except in cases where labor itself, by its own organization, has prevented itself from being plundered by the employer.

PROTECTION AS IT IS PRACTICED IS AN OPEN, OBVIOUS FRAUD.

It is time that the New England Senators were dropping the mask of superior knowledge and of mysterious learning with regard to the protective tariff.

The worst enemy of protection, as it is practiced, is detection.

The infinite pains taken by the committee in charge of this bill to furnish Members of this body with all sorts of data except the vital facts with regard to "the difference in cost of production at home and abroad," does not argue well for their judgment or for their sincerity in dealing with this question.

I am more than willing to believe that they have merely followed a beaten track and trodden the pathway of greatest convenience, of easy good nature, but I can not but feel that a generous complaisance to those who have contributed to their successful campaigns is also responsible for the lack of this essential information. I wish to make record here that the information which I have obtained with regard to this matter is due to no effort of theirs. I have been compelled as a Member of this body to dig out laboriously the information which I lay before the Senate.

How does the Senator from Rhode Island explain the fact that in the unprotected industries of New England, of transportation for example, the station agents get an average daily pay of $2.03, while a carding machine tender in the protected cotton-goods industry receives 13 cents an hour, and the dyers 15 cents an hour, and the spinners 13 cents an hour, and the weavers 19 cents an hour?

How does he explain that enginemen in the unprotected industry on the railway service receive $3.78 a day and conductors $3.26 a day, and in the protected industry of printing textiles the bleachers receive 13 cents an hour, the calenderers 14 cents an hour, the color mixers 14 cents an hour, and dyers 15 cents an hour?

How does the Senator from Rhode Island explain why it is that in the unprotected industry of railways in New England firemen receive $2.20 a day, trainmen $2.32 a day, carpenters $2.25 a day, section foremen $2.24 a day, laborers $1.85 a day, when in the protected industry of hosiery and knit goods the knitters receive only 20 cents an hour for men and 13 cents an hour for women, loopers 14 cents an hour, the menders 13 cents an hour, the men pressers 17 cents, and the women pressers 10 cents an hour?

And how do these higher wages in unprotected industries contrast with the blast-furnace men and cinder snappers receiving 15 cents an hour, the hot-blast men 19 cents an hour, the keepers' helpers 17 cents an hour, and the top fillers 17 cents an hour?

The plain truth is that in the unprotected industries of transportation, as shown by the compilation of wages by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the labor in the unprotected industries of the building trades, compiled by the American Federation of Labor, by William J. Spencer, secretary, is far better paid than in the protected industries of the cotton mills, the hosiery mills, the woolen mills, and iron mills, and other factories.

The tables submitted of the wages of the building trades, which are unprotected, show that they receive a wage over 200 per cent higher than the wages in the protected industries, and the reason for this is not difficult to see. Labor in the building trades and in the railroad business is comparatively easy of organization, because the men in the railroad and building trades are out of doors and can be reached and talked to and organized. They are not locked up inside of the jail-like inclosures of private factories, where it is almost impossible to reach the employees or to organize them.

Labor has rarely succeeded in thoroughly organizing itself in any of the great manufacturing industries, which are usually controlled by monopolies and mechanical corporate power.

Organized labor was practically driven out of the shops of Andrew Carnegie and of the United States Steel Corporation. American Tobacco Co., Cramps' shipyards, and various others of the existing monopolies.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has put in tables—I have not seen them—showing the wages in protected and unprotected industries. In the New York Sun of the 13th instant there is a dispatch from London giving the wages paid in unprotected industries in Great Britain. Is the Senator willing that I should have this inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. OWEN. I am perfectly willing that it should be inserted in my remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. Thank you.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be inserted.

Mr. OWEN. I will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that in my examination of this matter I have tried not to make a partial statement giving the facts favorable to my view and those unfavorable to the other side, but have tried to give, in a just measure, both sides, because the only purpose which I have in view is to arrive at the truth and to make it manifest. I do not know what the quotation from the Sun is nor its sources nor its accuracy.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a dispatch bearing a London date, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I have heard of dispatches from London which were not reliable.

The matter submitted by Mr. GALLINGER is as follows:

WOMEN ON STARVATION PAY—REVELATIONS OF THE "SWEATING" SYSTEM IN LONDON—FACTS BROUGHT OUT BY A POOR SEAMSTRESS'S ATTEMPT AT SUICIDE—HOME WORKERS, 62 CENTS TO $1.10 A WEEK—AVERAGE WEEKLY PAY OF ENGLISH WOMEN $1.75.

[From New York Sun, June 13, 1909.]

A poor little seamstress attempted suicide in London recently. She jumped into the Thames and was ignominiously fished out, not drowned, and not in the least repentant. Then questioned as to reasons for her act she had only one to give. She simply could not keep body and soul together by working her hardest at her trade, and in utter fatigue she had decided to end her struggles.

There was nothing very new in her story, but when she explained that she always had plenty of work to do, the only difficulty being to live on the prices paid for her labors, London was roused from its apathy long enough to protest against the "sweating" of women thus revealed.

The House of Lords once defined "sweating" as a condition under which work is carried on in insanitary surroundings and for low wages. There are those who would add that it is a condition of labor which does not give the laborer, in return for a fair day's work, enough to maintain himself and his family in decency and comfort.

In England it is women who are the greatest sufferers from sweating. Their average wage, taking it all the year round and allowing for sickness and slackness, is not much more than $1.75 a week. The Lancashire textile trade average is $3.75, and in some districts as much as $6; but this comparatively high rate is pulled down by the East End home worker, who earns anything from 62 cents to $1.10 a week.

In the unskilled women's trades there is no standard by which wages are computed. For instance, one famous firm of cocoa manufacturers pays women for filling bags with cocoa 28 cents a thousand bags, and exactly the same work is done for 16 cents for another firm. In East London there is a firm whose girls earn $3.50 a week by packing tea. In the same locality there is another firm, the head of which is a well-known sportsman and yachtsman, where the earnings of the girls average only $1.87 a week.

The manager of a tin-plate factory recently fixed time rates at $1.50 a week for his women workers, and he openly gave the reason that they had taken advantage of piecework rates to make too much. Some had earned $4!

The average wage paid to waitresses in tea shops or restaurants throughout the country does not exceed $2.50 a week. On this the girls must keep up a neat and well-dressed appearance. Then wages are likely to be interfered with and even, if "necessary," reduced.

Many firms don't pretend to pay their girls a living wage. The head of a large company was asked recently how he expected the girls in his employment to live on $1.50 a week.

"I don't expect it," he answered. "Immediately we hear that a girl has lost her father or that she has no outside means of support, she is discharged."

This same firm employs what it calls "half-day waitresses." They work from 11.30 a. m. till 6.30 p. m. for $1 a week. All tips are forfeited.

The lot of the home worker is the worst of all. Miss Mary MacArthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, gave a picture of the home worker in the East End in an interview.

"So terrible is their life that I wonder that they take the trouble to exist at all," she said. "Here is a single room in a Stepney slum. The furniture consists of a table, a chair, and a bed. The unfinished trousers at which the woman stitches serves as a blanket at night.

"She slaves from daybreak until her eyes fail, and she never earns more than 5 shillings a week. She sustains herself mainly, almost entirely, upon weak tea. Some days she drinks 14 cups, making the same tea leaves do service again and again. That is one of the women slaves of England, and there are thousands in similar plight.

"I know many women who make men's shirts at 1 shilling or 9 pence a dozen. I have even found the actual worker making at 8 pence a dozen shirts which had originally been given out at 1 shilling a dozen.

"There is a girl in Woolwich; she has one child, aged 2 years, entirely dependent upon her. She is a shirt finisher and does buttoning and buttonholing by hand. She is paid 5 shillings a dozen for collars. Remember, this is high-class work. Cotton costs her from 3 pence to 4 pence a week. Her average earnings are 4 shillings 6 pence a week, or from one-half pence to three-fourths pence an hour.

"Every day she has to spend an hour and a half in fetching her work, as it is only given out in small quantities. Sometimes she has worked with hardly any break for 20 hours, from 6 a. m. until 2 a. m. the following morning. The rent of the room is 1 shilling and 6 pence a week.

"All this she told the parliamentary committee. The members of Parliament were aghast. Some were incredulous. 'But how do you live, you and the child?' asked one member of Parliament. 'We don't live,' the woman replied, with a passion in her tone I had never heard before. 'Often we have no food at all.'"

Miss MacArthur contends that goods are not sold any cheaper when made by sweated labor. She tells of a fur-lined motor coat, marked at $105, which was made for $1.88 by sweated labor; and of a $5.25 nightdress for which the home worker who made it got 5 cents—63 cents for a dozen of these nightdresses. The employer of the girls who made these nightdresses said he could not pay more, as there was no profit in his trade.

There are many persons who are struggling to organize and help the women workers of England. There is a scheme for a trades board, which shall fix a legal minimum wage, and there are other propositions which will help to do away with the present sweating system, if they are ever put into practice.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire might have struck out the London heading and inserted New York, Pittsburgh, or Jersey City, and the cruel oppression of labor by organized capital, uncontrolled by law, would not be overdrawn, as I shall abundantly show before I conclude.

The Senator and the party of which he is a conspicuous leader have a duty to perform in which they seem strangely oblivious.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has made a comparison about a man, a bricklayer——

Mr. GALLINGER. Or a plumber.

Mr. SMOOT. In an unprotected industry, receiving 60 cents an hour, while a little girl who does spooling in a woolen mill gets 14 cents. Is that a fair comparison?

Mr. OWEN. I should say it is not a fair comparison. That comparison has not been made.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator just made a comparison that was even worse than that, because he spoke of burlers in a woolen mill, and they were receiving 11 cents.

Mr. OWEN. I gave, in extenso, the wages paid to burlers and to all other employees in woolen mills and in silk mills and in cotton mills, stating what it was, whether they were male or whether they were female. I have given them all, and the comparison is just which I have made, substantially, and no comparison the Senator might suggest of a little girl and a big, burly brick mason, who weighs 247 pounds, will affect the general comparison in the slightest degree.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the comparison which the Senator makes. And in relation to the wages paid here for weavers, I may say I do not know a weaver in any part of this country who earns so small an amount as that stated by the Senator. I have many times seen weavers earn as high as $3 a day, and the higher the wage they earn the better it is for the manufacturer, because they are all on piecework.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator challenge the accuracy of the census in this matter?

Mr. SMOOT. I challenge the figures the Senator gave here as to the wages paid to woolen weavers in this country.

Mr. OWEN. Then I commend the Senator to the United States census, from which the table was taken, and he may dispute the authoritative tables of the Federal Government; but he can not correct the accuracy of my quotation from the census reports.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not saying that the figure quoted by the Senator was not quoted from some table, but I do positively say that weavers in this country are not paid the price the Senator quoted.

Mr. OWEN. I appeal from the evidence of the Senator from Utah, as a special pleader, to the evidence of the Federal census and of the London Board of Trade, and prefer to take the census of the United States and the official figures to his off-hand comments.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I cordially yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have been very much interested in the Senator's statistics and figures, but it has often occurred to me that the industries to which he refers as unprotected industries are really the only perfectly protected industries we have in the United States, for the reason that if a man is to build a brick house here at all he has no competition from any quarter on earth. A man making a horseshoe has to be protected by a law, but a man shoeing a horse has an absolute, perfectly natural protection, because the horse has to be shod where he is and not in some other country, and no competition, direct or indirect, beats upon those occupations which are naturally and perfectly protected.

Mr. OWEN. I think there is force in the observation of the Senator from Iowa, and I shall not quarrel with it, but content myself with saying that like industries abroad are also much better paid than factory labor. But I do call attention to the fact that these men who are in the railway service and in the unprotected building trades and not in the business of manufacturing woolen or cotton or flax textiles are receiving a very much higher reward than those who are in those industries, and I have shown by thes tables that they could be paid a much larger price without depriving the factories of a just reward. If there were some competition, it would be far better for labor; and if there were some measure of competition in this country, I believe it would be better for the manufacturers themselves.

LABOR HAS NOT BEEN ABLE TO SHARE EQUITABLY WITH TH.. EMPLOYERS IN THE VALUES THAT LABOR HAS INCREASINGLY CREATED.

In volume 8, page 982, of the Twelfth Census, 1900, is the following table. It shows that labor received in 1850 23.21 per cent of the total value of products, while in 1900 it received only 17.8 per cent of the product, although the per capita increase in production was greater by 130 per cent in 1900 than in 1850.

Year.	Average number of wage earners.	Total annual wages.	Total annual value of products.	Average per capita production.
1850	957,059	$236,755,464	$1,019,106,616	$1,064
1900	5,321,389	2,330,578,010	13,039,279,566	2,451

Year.	Average annual wage.	Per cent of product paid in wages.	Per capita increase in production in the 50 years.	Per capita increase in wages in 50 years.
			Per cent.	Per cent.
1850	$247	23.21
1900	437	17.80	130	77

From Exhibit 1 labor shows a diminishing wage as compared to value of its product.

In textiles labor received 22 per cent of the product in 1890, 20.8 per cent in 1900, 19.5 per cent in 1905.

In the iron and steel industries labor received 24.9 per cent of the product in 1890, 22.1 per cent in 1900, 16.5 per cent in 1905.

In the leather industries labor received 20.1 per cent of the product in 1890, 16.9 per cent in 1900, 16.5 per cent in 1905.

In paper and printing industries labor received 26.5 per cent in 1890, 23.1 per cent in 1900, 21.6 per cent in 1905.

In metal and metal products labor received 20.4 per cent of the gross product in 1890, 12.9 per cent in 1900, 12.7 per cent in 1905.

In tobacco industries labor received 21 per cent in 1890, 18.9 per cent in 1905.

Labor has constantly grown in efficiency, but has not been able to share equitably in the value it has created.

Taking a special industry, such as iron and steel, including rolling mills and blast furnaces, as shown by the special report of the United States Census Office, Part IV, selected industries, 1905, on pages 5 and 16, will be found the tables for the years 1890 and 1905. I submit an analysis which shows that the per capita increase of the product of labor by weight was 50 per cent; by value, 33.5 per cent; while the increase in wages is only 11 per cent.

Year.	Average number of wage-earners employed.	Total annual wages paid.	Total value of products.	Total weight of products in tons.
1890	171,181	$89,273,956	$478,087,519	16,261,478
1905	242,740	141,639,906	905,854,152	34,844,933

Year.	Per capita increase in production in 15 years in values.	Per capita increase in production by weight.	Per capita increase in wages in 15 years.	Average weekly wage.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
1890				$10.02
1905	33.5	50.5	11.5	11.20

These figures might be multiplied indefinitely in all of the monopoly-controlled industries.

I submit a table of the wages in the woolen and cotton goods factories of New England. It shows that they do not receive today an average wage of exceeding a dollar a day, a fact of special interest in connection with this controversy where the schedules are supposed to be written for the protection of labor.

Wages 1860 and 1900 compared in woolen and cotton goods factories of New England.

Year.	Number of employees.	Wages.	Wages per capita.	Value of product.	Value of output per capita.	Pounds of cotton used.	Actual increase in output by weight.
							Per ct.
Cotton:
1860	81,403	$16,720,920	$205	$79,359,000	$794	283,701,306
1900	164,941	56,258,202	341	191,690,913	1,162	940,908,114	331
Woolen:
1860	25,583	6,144,847	240	47,722,814	1,474
1900	82,472	31,230,772	378	161,566,277	1,934

This schedule shows that, counting the best paid labor, the annual average wage of the employees in the cotton and woolen mills do not exceed $1 a day, and that, therefore, the pretense of better paid labor in the United States in the cotton and woolen mills, at least, is not true, because such wages do not greatly exceed the wages in Europe; and measured by purchasing power, probably do not exceed them at all; and measured by the output of American labor, which is twice as efficient as European labor, the American labor is not as well paid as European labor. The American manufacturer gets all the net profit. It has been shown in this debate what the enormous profits of the cotton and woolen mills have been, and our statistics clearly demonstrate the inequitable manner in which these profits have been proportioned between the American monopolists and his foreign-born workmen.

AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN WAGES IN PROTECTED INDUSTRIES COMPARED.

I submit this comparison of wages in the United States, Germany, France, and the United Kingdom, with the proper authorities, showing that the wages paid in the United States in the textile industry do not very greatly exceed those paid in Germany, France, and England, while it is conceded that the output of the American laborer is twice as much as in Europe.

The spinners, for example, in Germany in 1905, at Mulhausen, received from $6.57 to $7.30 per week. In France they received $5.91, and in the United States $4.12. The weavers, on the contrary, received in Germany $4.02 to $4.75; in France $4.48 to $5.19; in the United Kingdom, $5.11 to $7.06; and in the United States, $8.29. So that the weavers in our country received double as much as they did in Germany, and the spinners in our country received a smaller money wage than in either Germany or France.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the table show that the weavers receive less than the spinners in Germany?

Mr. OWEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. Whoever prepared the table does not know a thing about manufacturing, and it can not possibly be true.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Utah having corrected the United States census with regard to employees in cotton factories, may now correct the tables used by the Board of Trade of the United Kingdom in their report to Parliament, from which this is taken.

Mr. SMOOT. I know just as well as I know I am alive that there is no country that can employ weavers at a less price than they can spinners. Spinners are boys and girls. Weavers are men and women. It can not be possible. It is a mistake.

Mr. OWEN. I again appeal from the personal assurances of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to the records of the Board of Trade of London and of the United States census, from which these figures are accurately taken; and I call attention to the fact that the Senator from Rhode Island, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, when he was giving these tables, confined himself to those parts of the tables favorable to his contention and failed to insert those parts of the tables which were unfavorable to his contention, and such a leadership I neither approve nor follow.

These tables show the differences which I have pointed out, and they speak for themselves and are easily capable of their verification.

NOTE.—In 1905 the wages received at St. Etienne, France, by ribbon weavers varied from $3.51 to $4.66 per week. In 1906 it was over 100 per cent more than this. In August, 1907, it was from 30 per cent to 50 per cent higher than in 1905. These weavers received as pay, in piecework, from one-half to two-thirds the value of their product.

Report of board of trade: Cost of living in German towns, 1908; Cost of living in French towns, 1909; cost of living of working classes, United Kingdom, 1904.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he has consulted Bulletin No. 80, published in January, 1909? It is four years later than the one he quoted from. If the Senator will turn to page 63, he will find that in Dundee male shifters are working for $2.29 a week in the textile mills, and male preparers are working for $2.51 a week. It seems to be an extraordinary low wage. There is nothing like it in this country, I take it, and yet that is in the unprotected textile mills of Great Britain and from a recent publication by our Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. OWEN. I have these tables of 1904 and 1905, which compare the dates as nearly as they could be compared, and have not attempted to compare the tables of Great Britain, made by the board of trade there, with the tables made at a very different period. I have compared them as nearly as they were available of adjacent years. But, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, that the question of "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad" is easily discovered, and he illustrates that he knows how to do it.

I now take a table—Exhibit No. 6, the wages and cost of living in the United Kingdom, Germany, and France, showing the average family income, the cost of living, the articles of food, and so forth. I ask that it may be printed in my remarks without reading.

As Exhibit No. 6, I submit the wages and cost of living in the United Kingdom, Germany, and France.

IT WOULD NOT BE DIFFICULT TO DETERMINE WITH COMPARATIVE PRECISION THE DIFFERENCE IN THE COST OF PRODUCTION MEASURED BY THE COST OF MATERIALS AND OF WAGES, THE RELATIVE EFFICIENCY OF LABOR, AND THE PURCHASING POWER OF THE WAGE RECEIVED. FUTURE TARIFFS SHOULD BE BASED UPON SUCH INFORMATION COMPILED BY EXPERTS EMPLOYED FOR THE PURPOSE. THIS WOULD GIVE A PROPER BASIS FOR DETERMINING THE DIFFERENCE IN COST OF PRODUCTION AT HOME AND ABROAD, AND FOR DETERMINING THE EXTENT TO WHICH THE AMERICAN MANUFACTURER WOULD BE PROTECTED IN PERCENTAGES OVER AND ABOVE THE DIFFERENCE IN THE COST OF PRODUCTION, AND WOULD ESTABLISH A SOUND FOUNDATION UPON WHICH TO WRITE A TARIFF FOR REVENUE WHICH WOULD AFFORD A LEGITIMATE AND REASONABLE INCIDENTAL PROTECTION, WITHOUT GIVING SHELTER TO MONOPOLY.

It will be observed from these tables the vital fact that the American laborer in the protected industries, and especially in the cotton and woolen industries, does not receive the enormous wages in comparison with the European workman in like industries which the advocates of high tariff would have us believe. On the contrary, their wages are very little, if any, better than those of the European workman, and that the workman in the United States, especially in the textiles, has been compelled to supplement his own wages by compelling his wife and his daughter and his children of tender years to help earn sufficient to enable them to keep body and soul together.

THE EXTREME USE OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN IN THE RACE FOR MONEY-MAKING.

An untutored, full-blood Sioux Indian was taken East and shown the glories of its civilization and, when he had been surfeited with sight-seeing, the question was asked him, what had struck him as the most important thing he saw, and he replied: "The way in which the white man makes his little children work."

So evil has been this result of a monopoly-breaking tariff in this Nation that a general alarm has been widely excited, and various States and committees throughout the Nation are engaged in attempting its correction. (Proceedings of the fifth annual conference, Chicago, Ill., National Child Labor Committee, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York.)

Bulletin No. 69, on Child Labor, Department of Commerce and Labor, shows that 26 per cent of the male children of the United States between 10 and 15 years of age are breadwinners; 1,264,000 male children between 10 and 15 years are breadwinners; 485,000 female children between 10 and 15 years are breadwinners.

2. If the number of children over 15, wage earners, and not yet adults were classified, it would be found very large. Table 164, Census Bulletin, page 69, for example, gives the number of children at home, at school, and employed as breadwinners in families in which there are female textile workers 10 to 14 years of age, for Chicago and New York, and out of 3,595 children over 15 years of age, 190 were at home, 52 at school, and 3,353 employed in gainful occupations. No record is made by the census of children not employed in gainful occupations under 10 years of age nor over 15 years of age; so that it is probably no exaggeration to state that four or five million of children are engaged in labor when they ought to be in school or at play.

By Census Volume 2, page cxxxi, it is shown that the number of females engaged in gainful occupations outside of domestic service was 5,329,292, and the probable number of women and girls now engaged in gainful occupations will probably exceed seven millions, 28 per cent being so employed in Massachusetts, 29.6 per cent in Rhode Island, 24.3 per cent in Connecticut, 20.8 per cent in New Jersey, 23 per cent in New York, and 7.9 per cent in Oklahoma. The reason for women being compelled to go into competition with men in the gainful occupations is largely because the men of the family do not receive enough to maintain the family and enable the women to have the means they require and to remain at home, where they properly belong, in a civilization of a high order. The driving of the American woman from the home, where her activities would best be employed in promoting her own happiness and the happiness of mankind, and where her services to the race would be best employed in raising children and teaching them the lessons of religion, morality, and the sturdy virtues taught by our forefathers, is not the least of the crushing effects of modern monopoly engendered by a monopoly protecting tariff and by the unrestrained avarice and ambition, with their false standards of life, which are thus set up in a mad race for power.

It will be seen by the wages in the textile industries that the cotton spinners of Germany and France are paid more in money than in the United States, the weavers less, and the mule spinners of France more, than those of the United States; that the woolen spinners of Germany and France are paid more money than they are in the United States, while the weavers are paid less, but in considering the fact that the money of the cotton spinners and woolen spinners of France and Germany will buy 50 per cent more than in the United States, the wages they receive are decidedly better. When it is remembered the American workman turns out twice as much as the German or Frenchman, then the ungenerous treatment of the American cotton and woolen spinners is obvious. It is also obvious that the plea of the Massachusetts and Rhode Island manufacturer that the HIGHER WAGES he is compelled to pay his cotton and wool spinners in order to meet the pauper labor competition of France and Germany is a monumental falsehood used to hoodwink the patriotism of the American people and lead them to tax themselves for the poor spinner's sake who toil in the cotton and woolen mills.

It is interesting to observe that labor in the protected industries of Germany, France, and the United Kingdom are paid much smaller wages than in the unprotected industries, and labor might well question the value of a protective system which operates throughout the world to give them less remuneration for their labor than in the unprotected industries.

A COMPETITION-PROHIBITING TARIFF HAS SERVED TO INCREASE PRICES AND LOWER THE PURCHASING POWER OF ALL WAGES AND OF ALL INCOMES.

In the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society for March, 1909, page 68, A. Sauerbeck, an acknowledged authority, gives a comparison of world prices, based on 45 commodities, and using as an index the standards fixed by the period of eleven years, 1867–1877, which in the aggregate was the equivalent of the average of the twenty-five years preceding; that is, from 1853–1877. The index number is 100.

Prices of commodities in 1908.

[By A. Sauerbeck.]

The following table shows the course of prices of 45 commodities during the last 20 years as compared with the standard period of 11 years, 1867–1877, which in the aggregate is equivalent to the average of the 25 years, 1853–1877. 1878–1887	79	95	76	84	73	71	81	76	79	82.1	97	99½	3⅞

It will thus be observed that as compared with 100 for 1853–1877, the grand total index number of world prices for 1889 was 72, and for 1899 to 1908 it was 72, a fall in prices due to the demonetization of silver throughout the world.

It will also be observed that the index number for 1889 and 1905 was 72; for 1908 it was 73, thus indicating a singular stability in the grand total of the world prices (London) since 1889, notwithstanding important intermediate variations.

Conceding that the volume of metallic money in the world, together with the law of supply and demand of other materials, are the determining factors fixing the average of world prices, it should be observed that the wonderful increase in the output of modern machinery as applied to all classes of products seems to have been about equaled by the output of metallic money, whose annual rate of gold output has approximately doubled since 1896.

This table also shows the effect upon world prices by the disturbance of commercial credits of the world by financial panic; the panic of 1893 being followed by the lowest world prices in a generation.

It would seem to follow that the lowering of prices stimulated purchases and exchanges and led to a corresponding reaction. The panic of 1907 was followed by an immediate reaction in world prices.

It is important to point out that, notwithstanding the increased output of merchantable articles, the increase of gold circulation available for the use of the world markets has been very large, and that this probably accounts for the substantial stability of world prices since 1889. These figures are of intense interest when compared with the changes in prices which have taken place in the United States. Taking the tables of the Statistical Abstract of 1907, it will be seen that middling cotton which was 11.07 cents in 1890 was 11.5 cents in 1906, having reached a very low price of 6.94 cents in 1894, just after the panic, and a still lower point of 5.94 cents in 1898, just after the Dingley bill passed; while standard sheetings for 1890 was 7 cents, and 1906, 7.25 cents, reaching a low point of 5.11 cents in 1894, just after the panic, and its lowest point, 4.2 cents, in 1898, just after the passage of the Dingley bill.

In like manner standard drillings and other cotton cloths fluctuated similarly following the panic and following the Dingley bill.

Mr. President, I now submit a table (No. 202) from the Abstract of Our National Statistics (1907), giving the relative wholesale prices of raw and of manufactured commodities of 1890 to 1906 and per cent of increase in prices for 1906 over prices for each preceding year; and also Table 203, giving the relative wholesale prices of commodities from 1890 to 1906 and the per cent of increase in prices from 1906 over prices for each preceding year by group of commodities.

NOTE.—From reports of the Bureau of Labor, Department of Commerce and Labor. This table summarizes wholesale prices of 258 staple commodities. The commodities designated as "Raw" are such as are marketed in their natural state and also such as have been subjected to only a preliminary manufacturing process; this group includes 50 articles. The commodities designated as "Manufactured" are such as have been subjected to more than a preliminary factory manipulation and in which the manufacturing labor cost constitutes an important element in the price; this group includes 208 articles. A relative price, or index number, as it is technically called, of any article is the per cent which the price of that article at any date is of the price of the same article at a date or period which has been selected as the base or standard. The base selected by the Bureau of Labor for this compilation is the average price for the 10-year period 1890 to 1899. The relative prices shown under each group are simple averages of the relatives of all articles included within the group. Average price for 1890–1899=100.

NOTE.—From reports of the Bureau of Labor, Department of Commerce and Labor. The group farm products includes 16 commodities; food, etc., 53; cloths and clothing, 75; fuel and lighting, 13; metals and implements, 38; lumber and building material, 27; drugs and chemicals, 9; house furnishing goods, 14; and the miscellaneous group, 13. I also submit Dun's tables showing the variations in prices in the United States.

It should be kept clearly in mind that the Federal census is to a very appreciable degree influenced by the manufacturing industries of the country favorably to themselves, and this difference is demonstrated by Dun's tables, which show the increase of prices to be much larger in the United States than as shown by Census Abstract Tables 202 and 203:

Leading classes of necessary articles of daily consumption—Prices, at primary markets, from July 1, 1860, to May 1, 1907.

NOTE.—In the above table the course of prices of commodities is shown, and in each case the price is multiplied by the annual per capita consumption, which precludes any one commodity having more than its proper weight in the aggregate. Breadstuffs include many quotations of wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, beans, and peas; meats include live hogs, beef, sheep, and many provisions, lard, tallow, etc.; dairy and garden products embrace eggs, vegetables, fruits, milk, butter, cheese, etc.; other food includes fish, liquors, condiments, sugar, rice, tobacco, etc.; clothing covers the raw material of each industry, and many quotations of woolen, cotton, silk, and rubber goods, as well as hides, leather, boots, and shoes; metals include various quotations of pig iron and partially manufactured and finished products, as well as the minor metals, tin, lead, copper, etc., and coal and petroleum; miscellaneous includes many grades of hard and soft lumber, laths, brick, lime, glass, turpentine, hemp, linseed oil, paints, fertilizers, and drugs. The third decimal is given for accuracy of comparison.

There thus appears by Dun's more accurate tables an increase from 1896 to May 1, 1907, of 46.7 per cent on total average of prices of 1896, and on clothing the increase from January 1, 1897, to May 1, 1907, was 69 per cent, and on miscellaneous articles was 55 per cent.

The two tables from our own census contain overwhelming evidence of the injurious results of the Dingley bill upon labor; it shows, for example, Mr. President, that prices have been increased on raw commodities 25.9 per cent over the average prices from 1890 to 1900, and 49.9 per cent over the prices of raw commodities under the Wilson bill.

Our prices were already in 1906 much higher than in Europe, so that these increases are the more striking.

Mr. President, do not the manufacturing classes themselves see that such an enormous raise in prices of raw commodities is injurious both to their domestic and foreign trade? Do they not see it necessarily limits the consumption of the people, whose little salaries are fixed, whose little pension can not be increased in dollars and cents, whose purchasing power is limited to a fixed wage, a wage not exceeding, among the manufacturing laboring classes, $160 per annum per capita?

The obvious result is to restrict consumption of goods, limit the output of goods, lower the factory output, and limit the demand for labor.

Mr. President, in like manner the increase of manufactured commodities in price, including a group of 208 articles, has been 35 per cent since the lower prices under the Wilson bill and an increase of 36.5 per cent upon all commodities above the more reasonable prices under the Wilson bill.

What corresponding increase of wages has labor received? Their wages are relatively less than they were 10 years ago, both in relation to the output of labor and in relation to the purchasing power of the wage received; and the demand for labor has been necessarily diminished by preventing the consumption of manufactured and other commodities, because of prices which could not be paid out of the limited number of dollars the ordinary American has received. Such a policy is injurious to the manufacturer, to the wage earner, to the common citizen consumer, to the business men of the entire Nation, and to our national growth and development.

And differentiating these increases of prices, it will be seen by Table 203 that the prices of 1906 for food are 34 per cent higher than they were in 1896 under the Wilson bill; that cloths and clothing have increased 31.4 per cent above the prices of 1896 under the Wilson bill; that fuel and lighting have increased 40 per cent since 1894 under the Wilson bill; that metals and metal implements have increased 56 per cent above the prices under the Wilson bill; that lumber and building material have increased 55 per cent over the prices under the Wilson bill; that house furnishings have increased 23.6 per cent above the lower prices of the Wilson bill; and miscellaneous articles of various kinds have increased 32.5 per cent above the more reasonable prices of the Wilson bill. Are the American people utterly oblivious to these striking and conclusive facts?

It is perfectly obvious from Sauerbeck tables of the prices of the world and from Dun's table of American (United States) prices that American (United States) prices have increased far beyond European prices since the low price of 1896, notwithstanding American (United States) prices were then much higher than they were in Europe. It therefore follows, beyond question, that the purchasing power of American wages, even of the starvation wages paid in the cotton and woolen mills, has been lowered in such a way as to greatly harm the American workmen, even in protected industries, and has harmed equally the entire American people, workmen, consumers generally, and even the manufacturers, who are severely taxing each other by high prices—the finished product of the one being the raw material of the other. The only people who have a net profit are those who own and control the successful monopolies.

Is the Finance Committee so committed to the demands of the representatives of organized greed in this country that they will refuse to deal justly by the American people?

Or do they believe that by making the rich richer and the poor poorer they will receive adequate political benefit at the hands of those whom they enrich?

I know, Mr. President, that it has been easy to finance Republican campaigns, and I know many good men have not stopped to think that this money was extorted from the misery and sweat of helpless men, women, and children.

Members of the Senate do not often visit the sweat shops, nor do they often see the sorrow and distress of the individuals who compose the weaker elements of our great Nation. I remind them that 500,000 die annually by our neglect, as shown by the comparison between the death rate of New Zealand and Australia, where better laws prevail, where the maxim of the law is "Better reduce want than increase wealth."

Mr. President, I feel charged with a solemn duty to make a record before the Senate of these conditions, and I deem it a great opportunity to have the privilege of submitting a prayer to the leaders of the Senate that they do not be unmindful or inconsiderate of the need and the rights of the inarticulate mass, and that they do not lend too complacent attention to the trained advocates of unsatisfied greed.

Senator Orville H. Platt, the late distinguished Senator from Connecticut, once said, in substance, in commenting on the faults of the American legislator, that "The American legislator should not be charged with incompetency. As a rule, he is fairly well qualified; neither can he be justly charged with dishonesty. There are a few who may be dishonest, perhaps, but they do not exercise any control of legislation. The fault of the American legislator is 'good-fellowship' and doing for a friend what under no other circumstances would the legislator for a moment consider. For that reason," said he, "I deem it the highest legislative virtue to be cross and crabbed to all the world, especially in the last 10 days of the session."

It will be thus seen that from Sauerbeck's tables the increase of the world prices has been much lower than the increases of prices in the United States, and that this difference must be accounted for in some reasonable manner.

The most natural way in which to account for it is to show that the prices in the United States are artificially controlled by monopoly.

And this average high increase must be interpreted in the light of a great offset of the lowering of prices of all products produced by the American people of which monopoly controls the price. For example, crude oil is produced by Oklahoma in vast quantities—approximately 50,000,000 barrels per annum—which sells for less than 1 cent a gallon, while the refined product retails for over 11 cents a gallon. It costs half a cent a gallon to refine it. The low price is fixed by the Standard on the crude and the high price is fixed by the Standard on the refined. And the increase of all prices is in the face of the vital fact that monopoly fixes an extremely low price on the articles produced by the people of which the monopoly controls the price. The average high price would be far higher except for the very low price, fixed by monopoly on its purchases, as on crude oil. This is not only true with regard to oil, but also is true with regard to cattle, hogs, sheep, hides, wool, various minerals, tobacco, and so forth. This low price of articles bought by monopoly prevented the general average from reaching the high point which they would otherwise reach in the statistical tables is a factor of great importance.

Without regard to statistics, everybody knows that the prices are now very much higher than they have ever been.

The schedules of this bill are approximately 50 per cent on the value of proposed imports and this is proof that the prices in the United States are 50 per cent higher than they are in Europe and abroad on the articles of these schedules by the open confession of the managers of this bill, and I therefore do not need to furnish further proof of this matter as the schedules confess that the prices in this country are approximately 50 per cent higher than they are abroad on articles affected by the present tariff law.

Mr. President, it is of great importance to observe these differences between our present prices and the increase of our present prices as compared with the increase of the prices of the world, because it thus enables us to determine to what extent local conditions have raised our prices above the level of the prices of the world.

WORLD PRICES AND PRICES IN THE UNITED STATES—RISE IN PRICES IN THE UNITED STATES NOT DUE TO INCREASE IN PER CAPITA CIRCULATION.

At first thought it might occur to some one that the higher prices in the United States were due to the larger per capita circulation, but this conclusion is impossible because, while our per capita circulation December 31, 1906 (Statistical Abstract, 1907, Table 269), was $33.99; France had a per capita of $40.88 and Germany $25.03 and the British Empire $28.12, with no substantial differences in competitive prices at London, thus exhibiting the interesting fact that this enormous increase of prices in the United States, and the fact that United States prices are much higher than the level of world prices, is not due to our increased circulating medium, but is due to the monopolies in this country which have for commercial purposes raised these prices in America far above the prices in the markets of the world.

That these high prices are not necessary for the maintenance of a reasonable profit is shown by the table of lower prices at which these same American goods are sold abroad by the protected monopolies in this country.

A few of these prices are submitted to prove that the prices in the United States under monopoly will average 50 per cent higher than in the markets of the world.

As evidence of this I submit tables from James G. Parsons showing the differences in discounts between export and home prices:

It is thus seen that our own manufacturers, to obtain the protection from foreign competition, not only do not give American consumers the low prices they are entitled to, but they give all the benefit to foreigners. These tables demonstrate that the pretense of high tariff to protect themselves against the cheap labor of Europe is false; that our manufacturers can compete and do compete in the open markets of the world, and that they actually do give to foreigners the benefits they deny to Americans, of whose patriotic self-sacrifice they take wrongful advantage.

Protection's favors to foreigners is strongly set forth in Senate Document No. 54, Sixty-first Congress, first session, prepared by James G. Parsons, and submitted by me to the Senate, and to which I refer for the most abounding evidence for the truth of my contention—that this bill and its immediate predecessors, the Dingley bill and the McKinley bill, were written under the color of serving the American laborer, when, in point of fact, it has done nothing of the kind, but, on the contrary, favors the foreigner at the expense of the American.

The defense of this indecent practice has been abundantly answered in Document 54, and I shall not take the time to further comment upon it.

A similar table, showing that our prices are 50 per cent higher than world prices, is submitted (Exhibit 12), prepared by Byron W. Holt, of New York.

Our great agricultural products have their prices fixed by the markets of the world, except where freight prevents.

The price of corn per bushel was 55 cents in 1892 and 53 cents in 1906, and wheat was 93 cents in 1891 and 82 cents in 1906, and exported cattle in 1891, $81.25, and $93.17 in 1906 under improved methods of feeding and transportation, while cotton was 10 cents in 1890 and 11 cents in 1906.

We have a right to expect cheapening of manufactured products because of the constant increasing improvements in machinery—and in this we are disappointed—and a rise in the price of agricultural products produced from an area necessarily limited, and in this we are not gratified.

The prohibitive tariff has increased the cost of living of the workman and of every other person in the United States, and therefore has diminished the purchasing power of the wages received.

I have submitted Table No. 202, Abstract of Census, 1907, page 577, which shows that raw commodities have increased since the Dingley bill went into effect 49.9 per cent, manufacturers' commodities have increased 32.3 per cent up ot 1906, and all commodities have increased 35.4 per cent up to 1906, and still higher in 1909.

Mr. President, I now submit Tables 197 and 206, which show in detail the increase of price of food products, showing lard to have increased, since 1896, 38 per cent, corn meal 29 per cent, fresh pork 41 per cent, salt pork 55 per cent (Statistical Abstract of Census, 1907), and similar increases in other things required by the consumer.

LABOR IS HARMED BY THESE HIGH PRICES.

Mr. President, it is obvious that the laboring man who receives a fixed wage, or the laboring woman who receives a given number of dollars, whether in the factory, on the farm, in the mine, in the forest, or in domestic service, by an increase of 34 per cent in the price of all articles to be bought with wages received will be required to pay $134 to buy the same amount of goods which cost $100 in 1896 under the Wilson bill.

This means the equivalent of a flat loss of 25 per cent of the narrow wages received by the working people, and shows that the results of this tariff have been seriously injurious to the working people, because of these artificial prices.

HIGH PRICES INJURIOUS TO SALARIED PEOPLE.

Under these high prices it would take, in 1906, $1,354 to buy as much as $1,000 bought in 1896; in other words, a salaried man who received a salary of $1,354 in 1896 could save out of it $354, but to buy the same things in 1906 would take his entire salary of $1,354, and leave him nothing saved.

The effect of these high prices on the salaried man is to diminish the purchasing power of his salary 25 per cent.

This is the probable reason why Congress raised the salaries of Members of Congress and of Senators 50 per cent; it was to keep the Senators and Members of Congress from suffering the injury which the Dingley bill inflicted on the balance of the country.

HIGH PRICES ARE INJURIOUS TO THE MANUFACTURERS.

High prices on raw material (and one manufacturer's raw material is the finished product of another manufacturer) has the effect of making it more difficult for American manufacturers to compete in the markets of the world, because their first cost on this very account is heavier than would be the case with their foreign competitors.

Our manufacturers do compete, however, on a considerable scale, because of the greater efficiency of the American workman and of American invention and improved processes, and because of rebates in foreign material bought and reshipped in manufactures.

In this way a market is afforded foreign material and denied our own materials unless they compete with foreign material at world prices.

But if the manufacturers could obtain a uniform cost of material 35 per cent less than it is now our commerce would be greatly multiplied, the activity of our factories wonderfully stimulated, all of America's laboring elements would be employed, and the productive energies of the Nation brought to the highest degree of activity and efficiency.

If lower prices should prevail, we would avoid the evil of underconsumption and need have no fear of overproduction.

The percentage of weekly earnings, retail prices, and the weekly earnings as measured by retail prices is shown by the Bureau of Labor bulletin, July, 1905:

	Weekly earnings per employee.	Retail prices.	Weekly earnings as measured by retail prices.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
1890	101.0	102.4	98.6
1891	100.8	103.8	97.1
1892	101.3	101.9	99.4
1893	101.2	104.4	96.9
1894	97.7	99.7	98.0
1895	98.4	97.8	100.6
1896	99.5	95.5	104.2
1897	99.2	96.3	103.0
1898	99.9	98.7	101.2
1899	101.2	99.5	101.7
1900	104.1	101.1	103.0
1901	105.9	105.2	100.7
1902	109.2	110.9	98.5
1903	112.3	110.3	101.8
1904	112.2	111.7	100.4

100 equals the standard prices averaged between 1890–1900.

It will be observed that even by these tables, coming from sources interested in putting the best face on the matter, the weekly earnings bought no more in 1904 than they did between 1890 and 1900, while they rose in 1896 to 104.2 from 96.9 in 1894, showing an increased purchasing power of over 7 per cent following the passage of the Wilson—lower tariff—Act.

Mr. President, the tables prepared by Edward Atkinson, of Boston (Exhibit 2), showing the relative number of persons who could be affected by a tariff, as far as their wages are concerned, in the so-called "protected or partially protected industries," should not be forgotten. It will be shown by these tables that 10,381,765 persons are farmers, planters, overseers, agricultural laborers, gardeners, florists, nurserymen, dairy men and women, and other agricultural pursuits, lumbermen and raftsmen, stock raisers, herders and drovers, turpentine farmers and laborers, and wood choppers, to which must be added all persons in professional service, 1,258,739; all persons in domestic and personal service, 5,580,657; and all persons in trade and transportation, 4,766,964; making a total of 21,788,125; and estimating those who are engaged in other services which could not be regarded as in any degree open to competition, it is found that out of a total of 29,074,117 there could not be exceeding 600,000 persons occupied in arts which would require a protective duty. This table is very carefully drawn and is convincing to a sincere and disinterested student. It therefore appears that very little over 2 per cent of the American people are employed in such a way as to really require any measure of so-called "protection," while 100 per cent of our people are taxed about 50 per cent on an average on all dutiable goods, to their very great injury, and without even benefiting the 2 per cent who are employees, mostly of foreign birth or parentage, in the so-called "protected industries," while nearly all of such industries are owned by monopolies who give their foreign employees the lowest wages in America and keep millions for themselves.

MONOPOLY.

This bill ought not to pass, because similar bills heretofore have established, and this bill will continue to maintain, monopoly, labor's chief oppressor, and will be followed by high prices, low wages, greater mortality to labor, increased crime, and extravagant and corrupt standards.

Mr. President, no man familiar with history of his country will seriously question that when the tariff has its schedules so high as to prevent competition from abroad it must engender monopoly at home.

The first step of triumphant monopoly is to cut off foreign competition; the next step is easily effected by any of a variety of successful expedients.

First. By the policy of placing a control of the stock of competing companies in the hands of a trustee for the purpose of preventing competition. This was nothing more nor less than a conspiracy in restraint of trade. The courts in due time pronounced the so-called "trust" an unlawful combination. The reason why it was unlawful was because it violated the common law of the English-speaking people. It violated the common law, which holds as void any contract in restraint of trade. The common law of our States holds a man is entitled to buy at a price fixed in a free competitive market, and that any restraint of trade denying the citizen this common law right is a fraud upon him. The present tariff law and the proposed law is conspicuously guilty of this sin, although its error has not yet been declared by the courts. A test case should be brought.

Indeed, it is a form of robbery under the color of law and carried on under the safeguards of organized society; it is a fraud to impose a prohibitive tax under the pretense of raising revenue, but in reality to protect monopoly. It is a species of immoral conspiracy which ought not to be endured by any nation of intelligent and liberty-loving men.

The contracts putting the control of the stock of competing companies in the hands of a "trustee," being the first form in which organized monopoly became conspicuously bad, has led to the term "trust" being loosely and incorrectly used to describe any monopoly.

Second. Another expedient by which monopoly was established was "a gentleman's agreement," by which prices were fixed by verbal agreement and not by contract. This was nothing more nor less than a verbal conspiracy, and was no less a fraud and unlawful than if the verbal agreement had been a legal contract in writing. The only difference between the two was the greater difficulty of detection of the combination.

The gentleman's agreement usually proved inefficient, because men engaged in this character of fraud could not trust each other.

Third. Another form by which the American people have been defrauded by monopoly is where a giant corporation, like the Standard Oil Co., sets a fixed price on crude oil and a price on the refined products, and because of its power intimidates the independent refiner and compels the refiner, through fear of destruction, in the crafty ways so fully described by Ida Tarbell in the history of Standard Oil, to recognize and maintain the prices so fixed. In this way the Standard Oil Co., through its subsidiary companies, sets the price of crude oil in Oklahoma of the best quality at 41 cents a barrel. No refiner wishes to violate this rule for fear of the Standard, and no refiner dares to offer to sell refined oil at less than the Standard price for fear of the Standard. It only cost one-half cent a gallon to refine petroleum, and crude oil costs 41 cents a barrel in Oklahoma. The people ought to get very cheap oil, but they do not get it, because the Standard Oil Co. overshadows the land and controls the market, both of crude oil and of the refined products.

It is a common practice for the independent refiners to stand on the prices fixed by the Standard, both on crude and refined, for fear that they will be destroyed. The history of the past is strewn with the wreckage of companies who have ventured to cut the prices of the Standard Oil Co.

I think the Congress of the United States ought to impose a rule on interstate corporations using the mails and enjoying public protection that they shall not vary their price to the consumers of the United States, except in so far as the difference in freight justifies. In this way the Standard Oil Co. could not put the price of refined below cost locally for the purpose of running out an independent competitor in a local field while the Standard at the same time raises the price in another field, with which to make the consumer pay the cost of this illegitimate warfare on a competitor. If the Standard were compelled to give the same price plus freight in all parts of the United States to the consumer, the Standard could not in that event afford to lower its local price for the purpose of killing off a petty competitor. And I appeal to the leaders of the Republican Party in the Senate of the United States to bring in an amendment to this bill providing this remedy.

I am sure the chairman of the Committee on Finance will appreciate the force of this observation, and if he does not afford the country the relief which I invite him to do he at least shall have no complaint of me that he did not receive a wise and virtuous suggestion from Oklahoma. I assure him that if he will submit the proper amendment he can rely upon the Senators from Oklahoma giving him enthusiastic support in such a policy.

I pause to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether he will bring in or support such an amendment?

I appeal to the leaders of the Republican Party in the Senate of the United States to bring in an amendment to the bill providing this simple, effective remedy against monopoly. If we want to establish competition in the United States, if we hope to maintain competition in the United States, we must protect the little competitor and not permit him to be killed off by ingenious processes. Otherwise we might as well recognize now that monopoly is fixed and is to be dealt with as monopoly. If we deal with it as monopoly, then a different process would be available, which I suggest to the Senate of the United States, and that is, conceding monopoly to be established, conceding that we can not control or that we will not control monopoly, I suggest that monopoly, having the power of taxation of the American people without limitations, shall be controlled by being limited in the dividends it may pay upon its invested capital, determined by physical valuation.

Fourth. But another and far more dangerous form of monopoly, skillfully drawn to avoid the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States with regard to contracts in restraint of trade, is the more recent successful plan of merging one corporation with another, such as illustrated in the United States Steel Corporation, by which all competitors of any importance were absorbed. It was organized in 1901, and at that time absorbed a number of gigantic concerns, to wit: Federal Steel, National Tube, American Steel and Wire Company, National Steel, American Tin Plate, American Steel Hook, American Sheet Steel, American Bridge, Shelby Steel Tube, The Carnegie Company, The Lake Superior Consolidated Iron Mines, and acquired interests in numerous other companies, such as the Pittsburg Steamship Company, The Oliver Iron Mining Company, The National Steel Company, including The Sharon Steel Company, The Union Steel Company, The Donora Mining Company, The Republic Coke Company, The River Coal Company, The Sharon Coke Company, The Sharon Ore Company, The Sharon Sheet Steel Company, and a controlling interest in the companies of the Sharon Coal and Limestone Company and the Sharon Tin Plate Company, and directly and indirectly controlling the American Coke Company, The Continental Coke Company, The H. C. Frick Coke Company, The McClure Coke Company, The Southwest Connellsville Coke Company and the United Coal and Coke Company, consolidated under the title of H. C. Frick Coke Company, acquiring also the Clairton Steel Company in May, 1904, The St. Clair Furnace Company. This contract carried with it the stock of the Champion Iron Company, The Clairton Land Company, the St. Clair Terminal Railroad Company, and 51 per cent of the stock of the St. Clair Limestone Company; in April, 1905, the Heckler Coke Company was acquired. On April 15, 1907, by lease United States Steel obtained the control of the Great Northern Railroad Company ore properties through the Great Western Mining Company, a subsidary company of the United States Steel Corporation, and so forth.

These gigantic mergers of the various companies, by which their competition with each other was effectually destroyed, formed the new company, which issued a total of stocks and bonds of about fourteen hundred millions, a large part of which was "watered," having no physical value corresponding with the face values of the stocks and bonds issued.

In 1907 this gigantic merger company took over the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company, which was itself composed of various companies merged together in the same fashion as the United States Steel Corporation, and was its only great competitor; under the control of this great merger company are various water-supply plants, natural-gas properties, pipe lines, ore docks, a multitude of iron mines, and some 25 railroad companies.

By these gigantic mergers competition is effectually controlled under the forms of law, and the resulting giant corporation has such a dominating and masterful position that smaller corporations dare not compete or cut the price or attempt to do so. Competition is thus utterly destroyed.

Moody's Manual for 1907, page 2320, gives over 1,000 companies absorbed or merged by or into other companies for 1907.

The smaller corporations engaged in the same business are indeed of some use to the giant monopoly, because the smaller corporation being in existence and doing business at the same prices fixed by the larger corporation, the greater concern can point to the smaller concern as evidence to the common people that there is active competition in the field. The common people may accept the testimony, but it will be a Barmecide feast when they test the prices .

When the people threaten to remove the monopoly tariff, which shelters monopoly, all of the agents of monopoly join in one mighty chorus in defense of the poor little independent man who will be utterly ruined if the tariff is lowered a particle. But the smaller concern is used as a highwayman might hold up a child to ward off a merited chastisement. It is, however, no chastisement and no injustice whatever to the monopoly to take down the tariff wall that shelters monopoly from reasonable competition, but merely a just action in restoring the competition which never should have been interfered with.

The United States Steel Corporation, I am informed, permits no organized labor in its service. The thoughtlessness of this monopoly of its labor, and its forgetfulness of its moral obligation toward poor human beings engaged in its service has been shown with great force in a recent philanthropic investigation conducted under the Russell Sage Foundation in the "Pittsburgh Survey." What these giant monopolies are capable of doing when not restrained by any other consideration than what is called "business" and the pressure for "dividends," "dividends," "dividends," is set forth in great detail in the "Journal of Constructive Philanthropy," published by the "Charity Organization Society of the city of New York," 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York; Robert W. deForest, president; J. P. Morgan, treasurer; Edwin T. Devine, general secretary, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City, in "Charities and the Commons" in the issues of January, February, and March, 1909.

What a monopoly tariff does for its protected workmen is abundantly set forth in this wonderful report of the unspeakable conditions which have grown up under our system of government, where the beneficiaries of the tariff have forgotten manhood, and have forgotten womanhood, and even childhood in their insane pursuit of wealth and power.

Ida M. Tarbell, a critical and learned student of sociology, has described it in a few words in the American Magazine of May, 1909:

A TARIFF-MADE CITY—WHAT IT DOES FOR THE WORKMEN.

The city of Pittsburgh is the greatest monument in this country to the practice of high protection. For 50 years it has been the stronghold of the doctrine. For 50 years it has reaped, as no other center in the United States, the benefits of prohibitive duties.

The town lies at the heart of a district in which is produced from one-quarter to one-half of all the various kinds of American iron and steel, as well as a goodly proportion of all our tin, plate glass, and machine-shop products. All of these articles have for years had the American market practically to themselves. All of these articles have for years been exported and sold at less prices than the American consumer can buy them. All these industries have produced enormous fortunes. So many, so conspicuous are they, that a recognized American type in Europe and the United States is the "Pittsburgh millionaire." Now, it is certain the tariff produced the Pittsburgh millionaire, but that was not what the tariff was fixed for by the Congress of the United States. The tariff was laid to protect and help the Pittsburgh workman. According to the protectionist argument, Pittsburgh, as the bulwark and center of protected industries, should produce the happiest, most prosperous, and best conditioned workmen in the United States. How is it?

There has just been published in Charities and The Commons (now The Survey) one of the most significant pieces of investigation the country has seen. It is the result of a year or more of work on the part of a band of trained investigators commissioned by the Charities Publication committee. It gives a blue print of Pittsburgh—the place itself, the people, and their work. What does this blue print show of the workingman under protection?

It shows him working twelve hours a day for SEVEN days in the week, and once in two weeks filling a "long turn," or a 24-hour shift. It is not simply the exceptional man who overworks in this cruel fashion. The 12-hour day is the extreme of an "altogether incredible amount of overwork by everybody," so the survey declares. Can you make a man by these hours? Is it any wonder that those who lived and walked among these men preparing this survey report their saying: "Too tired to read—too tired to think. I work and eat and sleep." Any wonder that they report the God-fearing women crying out for the old country: "We might not have been able to live so well there, but, oh, man, we could have brought up the children in the fear o' God and in a land where men reverence the Sabbath." Any wonder that those men who have not the restraining influence of a family drown fatigue at night in saloons and brothels?

And what do they earn for their toil? In the tariff-protected industries, steel and iron, the greatest number receive a wage, says the report, "so low as to be inadequate to the maintenance of a normal American standard of living—wages adjusted to the single man in the lodging house, not to the responsible head of a family." And this in industries where "to protect the workingman" this country has for years taxed itself millions upon millions of dollars. The estimated tariff profit in the Steel Trust alone in 1907 was $80,000,000. Who got the money? Go look at the steel palaces and chateaux in New York and Paris. Go ask the Pittsburgh millionaires who fill the glittering places of pleasure in the great cities of Europe and this country, who figure in divorce and murder trials, who are writing their names on foundations and bequests and institutions.

How does this "protected" workingman live? What kind of households are these "builded on steel?" The reporter of the situation summarizes them: "Evil conditions were found to exist in every section of the city. Over the omnipresent vaults graceless privy sheds flouted one's sense of decency. Eyrie rookeries perched on the hillsides were swarming with men, women, and children—entire families living in one room and accommodating boarders in a corner thereof. Cellar rooms were the abiding places of other families. In many houses water was a luxury, to be obtained only through much effort of toiling steps and straining muscles. Courts and alleys fouled by bad drainage and piles of rubbish were playing grounds for rickety, pale-faced, grimy children. An enveloping cloud of smoke and dust, through which light and air must filter, made housekeeping a travesty in many neighborhoods; and every phase of the situation was intensified by the evil of overcrowding—of houses upon lots, of families into houses, of people into rooms."

Among the worst illustrations of these typical conditions are certain properties owned by the very corporations who are reaping wealth from the tariff-protected products. These beneficiaries of the generosity of the American people, these gentlemen who, when they see the taxation in their interest threatened, hold up the laborer and his good as a reason for continuing it, what do they say when these conditions are pointed out to them: "We don't want to go into the housing business. We are manufacturers, not real estate dealers. We may be forced to build houses in certain new districts in order to attract and hold labor, but in an old, settled community let the laboring man take care of himself. We don't believe in paternalism."

They have had no more interest in preserving the lives of the men who do the terrible toil necessary to their wealth than in giving them decent housing. For years the death rate from typhoid fever in Pittsburg has been the highest of any city in the civilized world. Everybody knew it. Everybody knew why. There was no supply of pure drinking water. A filtration plant was needed. Did any Pittsburg millionaire offer to build it—insist that the industries which called the vast army of labor to Pittsburgh should build it? No; they left a corrupted city government to fight over the appropriations for the work and scattered in endowments and in institutions in other cities and other States many times the five millions needed in Pittsburgh to save the lives of the workmen. They hold up to the world for admiration their love of great material problems—they argue with the American people that their skill in solving these problems is a good and sufficient reason for continuing general taxation in their favor. But a problem which, worked out, would benefit nobody but the humble two-dollar-a-day man who sweats out his life in the heat of their profitable furnaces does not interest them. It might savor of paternalism!

Not even the child has touched them. The conditions under which the children of the poor are brought up in Pittsburgh are such that babies die like flies. Of those along the river, a settlement worker told Samuel Hopkins Adams, when he was working on health conditions for the Survey: "Not one child in ten comes to us from the river-bottom section without a blood or skin disease, usually of long standing. Not one out of ten comes to us physically up to the normal for his or her age. Worse than that, few of them are up to the mental standard, and an increasing percentage are imbecile."

As to the schools, here is what an authority says: "The school buildings are in many cases crowded, dark, dirty, often of three stories, and bad fire risks. The condition of the children in these schools, good and bad, rich and poor, may be known by the large proportion having defective teeth, reduced hearing, impaired vision. An excessively large number of them are mouth breathers, partially so because they are unable to breathe through their noses in the smoky air of Pittsburgh, and a very considerable number are below the stature and the weight determined for the average child. In a large percentage the defects of teeth, nose, and throat bring them below the physical normal. These are the children that wear out in childhood."

Is it a wonder that this gentleman suggested:

"Ought not the Pittsburgh schools to be closed and the children repaired?"

This Pittsburgh survey is the most awful arraingment of an American institution and its resulting class pronounced since the days of slavery. It puts upon the Pittsburgh millionaire the awful stamp of greed, of stupidity, and of heartless pride. But what should we expect of him? He is the creature of a special privilege which for years he has not needed. He has fought for it because he fattened on it. He must have it for labor. But look at him and look at his laborer and believe him if you can.

Justice takes a terrible revenge on those who thrive by privilege. She blinds their eyes until they no longer see human misery. She dulls their hearts until they no longer beat with humanity. She benumbs their senses until they respond only to the narrow horizon of what they can individually possess, touch, feel. She makes, as she has in Pittsburgh, a generation of men and women who day by day can pass hundreds of tumbled-down and filthy homes, in which the men and women who make their wealth live, and feel no shock; who can know that deadly fevers and diseases which are preventable are wiping out hundreds of those who do their tasks, and raise no hand. Little children may die or grow up stunted and evil within their sight and no penny of their wealth, no hour of their leisure, is given them. Women may pass hours of incessant toil and die, broken and unhonored, within their sight, and they raise no hand. Wealth which comes by privilege kills. The curse of Justice on those who will not recognize injustice is the sodden mind, the dulled vision, the unfeeling heart.

I. M. T.

I was interested after reading this distressing record of the misery and degradation of the employees in protected industries at Pittsburgh, and their great poverty, to observe, in striking contrast, that Mr. H. C. Frick, one of the masters of the iron, steel, and coke monopoly, was reported by the public press as trying to buy an oil painting by Holbein from the Duke of Norfolk for $350,000. I could not help thinking how scandalous it was to take the labor of these poor people and dissipate it in such folly.

The papers announce also that Mr. Schwab, another steel magnate, was successfully "bucking the tiger" at Monte Carlo and gambling on a gigantic scale. No doubt he has millions which he may hazard at the gambling table and not feel the loss; but where does he get it? He gets it out of the grimy sweat of a labor so poorly paid that the women and children must, of necessity, suffer degradation and physical, social, and spiritual degeneration.

The morning papers state that a New York lady now suing her husband for divorce has spent in the last 10 years $770,000 in various interesting and fanciful extravagances, paying from $500 to $800 for dresses, having scores of servants to dance attendance and promote the wildest vagaries of fashion. One can not pick up a paper without reading the unseemly and indecent waste of the national resources by those beneficiaries who profit by monopolies sheltered under a noncompetitive tariff, one which prevents all competition and gives them the power to combine at home for the purpose of fleecing the American people and picking their pockets wholesale by prices which are 50 per cent higher than the prices in the markets of the world. Side by side are babies dying like flies for want of proper food and air and decent environment. The omnipotent God will surely punish a nation or a party that sees these evils with callous heart and offers no remedy.

Some one might say that Ida Tarbell's picture is too graphic. I do not think it possible to convey in two pages the terrific arraignment of our civilization which is exhibited in the Pittsburgh Survey.

But I submit another authority, whose calm and disinterested judgment and statement of the facts ought to command the attention of the entire Nation.

RESULTS OF PITTSBURGH SURVEY.

Prof. Edward T. Devine, of New York City, general secretary of the Charity Organization Society of the City of New York (see Vol. III, Amer. Sociological Soc., May 1, 1909), gives a sketch of the results of the Pittsburgh Survey, describing what was found to be the actual fact at this great center of the protective industries. He says they found the following results:

I. An altogether incredible amount of overwork by everybody, reaching its extreme in the 12-hour shift for 7 days in the week in the steel mills and the railway switch yards.

II. Low wages for the great majority of the laborers employed by the mills; not lower than in other large cities, but low compared with the prices—so low as to be inadequate to the maintenance of a normal American standard of living; wages adjusted to the single man, not to the responsible head of a family.

III. Still lower wages for women, who receive, for example, in one of the metal trades in which the proportion of women is great enough to be menacing, one-half as much as unorganized men in the same shops and one-third as much as the men in the union.

IV. An absentee capitalism, with bad effects strikingly analogous to those of absentee landlordism, of which also Pittsburgh furnishes noteworthy examples.

V. A continuous inflow of immigrants with low standards attracted by a wage which is high by the standards of southeastern Europe, and which yields a net pecuniary advantage because of abnormally low expenditures for food and shelter, an inadequate provision for sickness, accident, and death.

VI. The destruction of family life, not in any imaginary or mystical sense, but by the demands of the day's work, and by the very demonstrable and material method of typhoid fever and industrial accidents, both preventable, but costing last year in Pittsburgh considerably more than a thousand lives, and irretrievably shattering many homes.

VII. Archaic social institutions, such as the aldermanic court, the ward school district, the family garbage disposal, and the unregenerate charitable institution, still surviving after the conditions to which they were adapted have disappeared.

VIII. The contrast—which does not become blurred by familiarity with details, but on the contrary becomes more vivid as the outlines are filled in—the contrast between the prosperity on the one hand of the most prosperous of all the communities of our western civilization, with its vast natural resources, the generous fostering of government, the human energy, the technical development, the gigantic tonnage of the mines and mills, the enormous capital of which the bank balances afford an indication, and, on the other hand, the neglect of life, of health, of physical vigor, even of the industrial efficiency of the individual. Certainly no community before in America or Europe has ever had such a surplus, and never before has a great community applied what it had so meagerly to the rational purposes of human life. Not by gifts of libraries, galleries, technical schools, and parks, but by the cessation of toil 1 day in 7, and 16 hours in the 24, by the increase of wages, by the sparing of lives, by the prevention of accidents, and by raising the standards of domestic life, should the surplus come back to the people of the community in which it is created.

The details of this tragic condition is found in the January, February, and March numbers of Charities and Commons, 1909, published in New York.

Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt that the great and powerful city of Pittsburgh, supplied as it is with some of the best brains and best men in the world, will correct, or at least abate, in some degree these conditions. I have no doubt that public sentiment throughout the United States will so influence our great commercial monopolies that they themselves will be led to a more considerate treatment of their laborers and cease to regard them as machines of iron or wood, to be worn out in production and renewed by others. I have the confidence in the patriotism and good sense of the leaders of both of the great parties of our country to believe that they will not endure the prolonged continuance of these conditions.

THE PROFITS OF MONOPOLY.

The Senator from Iowa gave us a graphic description of the unreasonable profits of the United States Steel upon its watered stock. Its net earnings after paying interest on bonds of subsidiary companies and the accounts of miscellaneous expenditures and charges amounted to one hundred and fifty-six millions. Its products for 1906 amounted to 13,511,149 tons of ingots, out of which was produced 10,578,433 tons of finished products.

Its assets for 1906 are stated (Moody's Manual, p. 2282) at $1,681,309,769; its net profits for dividends, 1906, were $98,219,088, exceeding $9 a ton on 10,578,433 tons of product, not counting profits to subordinate corporations.

Its profit on the finished product has exceeded $9 a ton, collected from the consumers of the United States under a tariff which prohibits the consumer buying elsewhere, and thus enables this gigantic corporation and its independent allies to exercise a complete monopoly of all our people.

The proposed schedule in this bill of 31.65 per cent average tariff upon all metal and all manufactures of metal operates not for the benefit of labor, but to establish monopolies which control labor, compel it to disorganize, imposes cruelty and extraordinary conditions upon labor, and, together with other monopolies, established in like manner, pick the pockets of the laboring men and of all other men from the Atlantic to the Pacific by artificial prices, which the retailer and jobber is compelled by penalties to observe, so that the wages received by labor is craftily and fraudulently taken out of his pockets by these stealthy organizations, whose lobbyists now infest this Capitol and falsely advise Senators and Members with regard to their duty in the premises.

Side by side with these abnormal developments will be found hundreds of thousands of honest companies, working at reasonable profits, engaging in legitimate competition, content with the ancient maxim of—

Live and let live, and who are also victimized by the exactions of monopoly in greater or less degree, as the case may be.

The prices which are lowered in the United States by legitimate competition are so far offset by the unreasonable high prices of monopoly that the general average has gone far above the markets of the world, as I have heretofore shown.

Mr. President, several Senators have shown on the floor the enormous profits made by various monopolies.

The authoritative record can be found in Moody's Manual of 1907, a volume of twenty-five hundred pages, giving the accounts of the corporations doing business in the country, but not by any means all of the monopolies. In these tables will be found the enormous profits which have been advertised to the public, stating what they have made. The record does not tell the entire story, by any means, but it tells enough. The manner in which the people of the United States are unjustly taxed by these artificial high prices in the interest of monopoly is shown by sugar.

Our record shows that the people of the United States consume 2,993,979 tons of sugar per annum. The London price is 2 cents a pound less than the New York price, so that the people pay about $40 a ton for sugar in excess of the London price—approximately $130,000,000—while the duty collected is only sixty millions, leaving a profit of seventy millions to the monopolies and interests protected by the tariff, amounting in this one item to about $5 per annum for every family in the United States.

In similar manner will be shown the profits to the trusts on pig iron, on steel billets, on steel rails, as compiled by the Actuary of the Treasury. (S. Doc. 45, 61st Cong., 1st sess.)

The profits of men's clothing amounts to 27 per cent, on women's clothing 42 per cent, and yet side by side with this manufacturer's profit the sweating system is in full force (an interesting account of which will be found in H. R. Report 2309, 52d Congress, 2d session), with ruinous conditions under which oppressed labor earns its miserable bread; industrious young women, 12 hours a day in the shops of unremitting industry, and increasing speed, earning $4, $5, and $6 a week. For a $10 suit 85 cents is paid for the making of a coat, 25 to 35 cents for the pants, and 20 to 25 cents for the vest; for a $15 suit $1.50 is paid for making the coat, and so on. It is no wonder, of course, people living in abject wretchedness of the sweatshops exhibit a very great mortality as compared with other people, and develop tuberculosis and other diseases.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 4, 1909, gives a table of some of the profits of the cotton mills of the country, submitted by Senator SMITH of South Carolina. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

[1] In addition to which a 25 per cent dividend was paid.

[2] In addition to which a 100 per cent dividend was paid.

For eight years average annual dividends for groups, 15.85 per cent.

The merger in the capital of earnings is not shown, nor in plant improvements out of earnings, which would make the earnings still larger. W. Irving Bullard, of Danielson, Conn., a great cotton manufacturer, is quoted as saying at Boston April 16, 1908:

A summary of 100 cotton mills in Oldham district, in England, shows the following remarkable facts: Capital invested, $30,501,230; net earnings, $6,605,785; average earning per mill, $66,055; dividend, 15⅞ per cent.

The average dividend disbursements for these 100 mills was 15⅞ per cent, while the net earnings show an average of 35½ per cent.

The indecent treatment of helpless labor by organized capital is not confined to America, but we ought to lead the world in the conservation of human life and unrewarded toil by laws wisely and humanely drawn.

The recent giant monopolies, engendered and sheltered by the prohibitive tariff, are responsible for the unrest of the country.

The American Tobacco Co., which has become sufficiently powerful to fix the price of all tobacco raised in the United States, advertises its assets for 1906 at $278,628,564. By merger and otherwise it controls the American Cigar Co., American Stogie Co., the Havana Tobacco Co., with various subcompanies, the American Snuff Co., the Lorillard Co., and so forth. The impatience and violence of the tobacco raisers in Kentucky and Tennessee, known as the "Night Riders," is due directly to the tyranny of this company, which, being strong enough to control prices, is enabled to exercise its will on the tobacco growers, who have been making a blind effort to protect themselves by force. In like manner the crushing effect of extreme poverty, due to the processes which I have described, is leading to actual crime in many ways and is responsible for the growth of radical socialism and anarchism throughout the world.

DISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH.

In "The Social Unrest," John Graham Brooks, on page 161, quoting Thorold Rogers (Oxford Economy), says:

In a vague way they (the laborers) are under the impression that the greater part of the misery which they see is the direct product of the laws enacted and maintained in the interest of particular classes. And on the whole they are in the right.

Quoting Prof. Smart, of Glasgow:

But when machinery is replacing man and doing the heavy work of industry, it is time to get rid of that ancient prejudice that men must work 10 hours a day to keep the world up to the level of the comfort it has attained. Possibly, if we clear our minds of cant, we may see the reason why we still wish the laborer to work 10 hours a day is that we, the comfortable classes, may go on receiving the lion's share of the wealth these machines, iron and human, are turning out.

So Prof. Cairnes, an economist noted for ability and caution, in his "Leading Principles" (ibid., 162), says:

Unequal as is the distribution of wealth already in the country, the tendency of industrial progress—on the supposition that the present separation between industrial classes is maintained—is toward an inequality still greater. The rich will be growing richer; the poor at least relatively poorer. It seems to me, apart altogether from the question of the laborers' interest, that these are not conditions which furnish a solid basis for a progressive social state; but, having regard to that interest, I think the considerations adduced show that the first and indispensable step toward any serious amendment of the laborer's lot is that he should be, in one way or another, lifted out of the groove in which he at present works and placed in a position compatible with his becoming a sharer in equal proportion with others in the general advantages arising from industrial progress.

Spahrs's table for the distribution of wealth in the United States, taken from his work, "The Present Distribution of Wealth in the United States," when our national wealth was $60,000,000, is as follows:

Class.	Families.	Per cent.	Average wealth.	Aggregate wealth.	Per cent.
Rich	125,000	1.0	$263,040	$32,880,000,000	54.8
Middle	1,362,500	10.9	14,180	19,320,000,000	32.2
Poor	4,762,500	38.1	1,633	7,800,000,000	13.0
Very poor	6,250,000	50.0	.....	.....	.....
Total	13,500,000	100.0	4,800	60,000,000,000	100.0

The inequalities have been steadily growing worse, and when a single person's fortune is estimated at a thousand millions and is gathering in $50,000,000 per annum of the net proceeds of the products of the labor of this country, while millions of human beings can not lay aside $50 apiece per annum, what must be the inevitable result? It is this condition, half understood, that is developing rapidly a sentiment of radical socialism, discontent, and social unrest.

Moody's Manual of 1907, page 30, presents a "General Summary" of corporations offering stocks and bonds for sale to the stock exchanges and recorded by him in great detail in a volume of nearly 3,000 pages, as follows:

	Total stocks and bonds.
Steam railroad division	$15,436,758,000
Public utilities division	8,130,464,000
Industrial division	10,156,333,000
Mining division	2,525,173,000

Page 35, Report (1907) Comptroller of the Currency, resources other banks and trust companies	11,168,511,516

In addition to this enormous volume of corporate wealth, which comprises a registered one-third of our national wealth, there is an unregistered volume of corporations which are close corporations which do not sell stock, which are personal corporations, amounting to thousands of millions of dollars.

I respectfully call your attention to the Statistical Abstract of 1907, Table 244, which sets forth the wealth of the United States, which shows clearly where its approximate ownership may be found, to wit:

Table 244, Statistical Abstract, 1907.

Where do the city laborers under protection come in as joint heirs of modern prosperity?

What part of this wealth created by labor is theirs?

They have no real estate, no live stock, farm machinery, manufacturing machinery, railroads, or under any visible classification. The only thing that they can have under this tabulation is clothing and a little personal property.

And yet the products of the labor in our specified manufacturing industries of 1905 reached a total of $14,802,147,087, for 5,470,321 wage earners, whose product was therefore worth $2,708 per capita.

These people received $2,611,540,532 in wages (Stat. Abst. U. S., 1907, p. 144), or $479 per capita.

This $479 each must feed and shelter and clothe and educate and provide leisure and the joyous participation in the common providences of God for an average of three people, on about $160 each per annum, or about an average of $13.33 per month.

There can hardly be much margin of saving under the circumstances for sickness, ill health, accident, or loss of employment.

In New York City, with over four millions of people, less than 1 in 40 has any real estate.

LESS THAN 100,000 OWN CITY.

[From the New York Times.]

Lawson Purdy, president of the board of taxes and assessments, in a speech at the City Planning Municipal Art Exhibition, said that the value of the taxable property in New York City is now estimated to be about $6,800,000,000. Two-thirds, or 67 per cent, of this property, he added, is land. Mr. Purdy said that it is estimated that less than 100,000 persons own every particle of the land.

Our wealth increases over $4,500,000,000 every year over and above our expenses. What proportion does labor, the creator of wealth, retain net out of its own creation?

A beggarly part, Mr. President. Our national policy can be improved; our national policy should be changed.

We ought not to persist in a policy artfully designed to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

FALSE STANDARDS OF LIFE.

Piling up enormous wealth in few hands is setting false standards of life and making classes whose sympathies are very far apart.

One can not help but be struck with the enormous cost of hotel services, for example, in the New York hotels conducted expressly for the patronage of the rich; $15 to $20 a day for a bedroom, sitting room, and bath is nothing unusual; $15 for a dinner for two persons is not regarded as extravagant; and side by side with this will be found families who can not save $30 net out of their labor of a year's time.

This may seem unimportant; I regard it as a matter of very great importance, illustrating the grossly unequal distribution of the proceeds of human labor; a condition which pampers one class and starves another; a condition which ought not to be encouraged by a nation which desires to preserve its liberties.

TIPPING.

The whole tipping system which in sections where these differences of wealth are most pronounced is an evidence offering itself on every hand to show that the servants who render service are not properly paid, and that the well-to-do class ought voluntarily to pay the servants for every little act. This system degrades the servant and puts him in an attitude of a beggar—a beggar which the giver of tips encourages in spite of himself. The whole practice which universally prevails in Europe emphasizes the relation of master and servant, of master and dependent, in which the servant is to be thankful for gifts, and it is injurious both to the one who gives and the one who receives and illustrates the false standards of living which are being established in this country. Men who serve ought to be properly paid in the first instance and not compelled to be put in the attitude of beggars in order to make a living. It lowers the moral tone of the American Republic.

MONOPOLIES' EVIL AND DANGEROUS METHODS.

Mr. President, piling up stupendous wealth in a few hands is dangerous to the welfare of the country. The Senator from Wisconsin, in his remarks on Senate bill No. 3023 a year ago, pointed out that practically 100 directors, interlocked with each other, controlled all of the great corporations of transportation, telegraph, telephone, express, and industrials in the United States. He gave their names and the corporations which they controlled in part.

In the remarks which I had the honor to submit on February 25, 1908, upon this bill (S. 3023), I pointed out the ability of a few men in New York to create a panic whenever they wanted to, and I pointed out how they could profit by it.

A few men control the management of the banks in New York City, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago, with associate banks throughout the country, and can make the stock market go up or down as they please by the simplest of all processes, to wit:

BY RESTRICTING CREDITS

when they want the market to go down—

BY EXTENDING CREDITS FREELY

when they want the market to go up.

The panic of 1893 was an artificial panic, because it was brought about in this manner for the purpose of putting an end to the talk of remonetizing silver, and as a political argument, ingeniously and powerfully exerted, it did finally put an end to it.

I was in the banking business myself at that time, and received a circular letter from New York pointing out the mischievous character of the discussion favoring remonetization of silver; that it was driving gold abroad. Several letters followed along the same line, and, I am informed, and believe, that these circulars were sent out at the instance of a committee representing banks belonging to the New York clearing house; that it was the definite and predetermined policy then and there to constrict credits; and that, finally, these banks struck the crowning blow by "calling," in June, 1893, the large volume of demand loans then on the street for immediate payment, when the usual credit accommodations were already quite cut off by these banks and their associate institutions and other associated financiers.

When this panic was over the weaker elements of the financial world by thousands had been compelled to give up their properties to the financial masters, who had accumulated cash for the purpose of taking over the property of less far-sighted and powerful operators.

I pointed out in my remarks February 25, 1908, the astonishing manner in which these forces had caused the stock market to go up and down, by which the unwary have been fleeced of their property during the preceding 10 years.

The panic of 1907 was an artificial panic, brought about by conspiracy, in my opinion, of men discussed by President Roosevelt as "malefactors of great wealth."

I think his description was precise and apt, and I think that the Senate ought never to be content until a proper inquiry has been made into the panic of 1907, to determine who the beneficiaries were of that artful, crafty, far-reaching, and terrible conspiracy, which has thrown millions of men out of employment and brought tears and grief to the unnumbered women and children in this land who have suffered the consequence of that financial panic.

I was informed with regard to what might be expected to happen nearly a year before it did happen.

The panic of 1907 was brought about by a prolonged bull movement, free extension of credits, maintaining stocks and bonds at a high figure until in sufficient volume they were loaded upon the unwary, to whom money was freely loaned on a proper margin, and then began the process of restricting credits, slowly, steadily, firmly, the masters of the market, the high priests of monopoly, having accumulated an immense volume of cash and cash credits, to be used when the market struck bottom. This they did, with the most magnificent results, making unnumbered millions out of the weaker elements who had been led into the trap of obtaining credits.

It is true that the panic resulted in paralyzing productive energies of the American people, disturbing credits throughout the whole world, and throwing millions of men out of employment and causing unspeakable suffering to many millions of women and children. But monopoly had its reward, if the accumulation of money beyond the needs of a human being can be called a reward; if a callous heart and deadened sensibilities to the sufferings of human kind can be called a reward.

I wish to say to the chairman of the Committee on Finance that his committee is, in my judgment, honor bound to determine who the beneficiaries of that financial panic were and to take steps against the possibility of its repetition. There was a double purpose in this panic. One was that the very powerful financially might double their holdings of property by smashing values, accumulating cash and cash credits, and buying in the stocks and bonds of weak financiers who could not stand the storm.

Another purpose was to discredit Theodore Roosevelt, whose heart had been moved by a resolute purpose to protect the people against such sinister forces.

In his message of January 31, 1908, he said:

WHO COMMIT HIDEOUS WRONG.

The attacks by these great corporations on the administration's actions have been given a wide circulation through the country, in the newspapers and otherwise, by those writers and speakers who, consciously or unconsciously, act as the representatives of predatory wealth—of the wealth accumulated on a giant scale by all forms of iniquity, ranging from the oppression of wageworkers to unfair and unwholesome methods of crushing out competition and to defrauding the public by stockjobbing and the manipulation of securities. Certain wealthy men of this stamp, whose conduct should be abhorrent to every man of ordinary decent conscience and who commit the hideous wrong of teaching our young men that phenomenal business success must ordinarily be based on dishonesty, have during the last few months made it apparent that they have banded together to work for a reaction. Their endeavor is to overthrow and discredit all who honestly administer the law, to prevent any additional legislation which would check and restrain them, and to secure, if possible, a freedom from all restraint which will permit every unscrupulous wrongdoer to do what he wishes unchecked provided he has enough money. The only way to counteract the movement in which these men are engaged is to make clear to the public just what they are seeking to accomplish in the present.

The absurd fluctuations of stocks controlled by these high financiers, I set forth at the time, illustrate the unspeakable folly of any citizen trusting himself upon a market capable of such uncontrolled manipulation. Monte Carlo is perfectly innocent by the side of this gigantic gambling house with its wonderfully improved modern machinery for misleading the judgment of the ordinary citizen, with its secret pitfalls and ingenious traps by which to defraud our people.

The spirit of monopoly—the idea of getting something for nothing—has done a great harm to the American people. Hundreds of thousands of people are the beneficiaries of it and many millions are the victims of it. Those who are enriched by it set new standards of extravagant living, of wasteful expenditure, and of false pride and bad example, the imitation of which has made the American citizen notorious throughout the whole world.

This bill, Mr. President, is a taproot from which monopoly partly draws its power, fattens, grows strong, and overshadows the land like an evil tree killing and impairing the life of those who stand beneath.

The violent manner in which the monopolists of this country juggle the stock market subjects it to tremendous changes from time to time, as shown in the following quotations:

These ranges are since 1900, and will be found in the New York Times Weekly National Quotation Review, page 13, of October 21, 1907:

I call attention to some of these figures, however: Adams Express went from 114 to 315, about 300 per cent; the Allis-Chalmers Co. went from 4 to 27, over 600 per cent. Amalgamated Copper, one of the giant concerns of this country, from 33 to 130, 400 per cent. And so it goes on through the list.

THE MONOPOLY-PROTECTING TARIFF SHORTENS THE LIFE OF LABOR AND EXPOSES IT TO GREATER MORTALITY.

Mr. President, in the last 40 years the world has wonderfully improved in medical knowledge. It has wonderfully improved in inventive processes, which have led to increased conveniences of life, which have developed the most important economies of production, manufacture, and distribution.

All of these things have tended to the prolongation of human life where people could receive the full benefit of them; so much so that it is probably no excessive estimate to say that the average of human life in the well-to-do classes has been increased by a period of 10 years. It has been one of the wonderful developments of increasing modern intelligence.

It is a grievous thing, therefore, to observe that notwithstanding these great benefits, which ought to be a common heritage of the human race, and notwithstanding the increasing longevity of the well-to-do classes, the entire average of life shown by the mortality tables has not been improved. The number of persons who die per thousand is substantially the same.

Mr. President, I submit the comparative mortality statistics of our country and the other civilized nations of the world.

The mortality statistics exhibit the remarkable fact that just in degree as poverty obtains and governments permit monopoly, without protecting the weaker elements from dangerous exposure, just in that degree the number of deaths from all causes rises in the annual average.

It is a very important matter, and it shows that just in degree as thoughtful men write their laws for the preservation of human life to that degree is human longevity extended; to that degree there is the conservation of the best of all national resources—the lives of the children, the lives of the workingmen and working women of the country.

The following table gives the number of people per thousand who died in the following countries from 1903 to 1906 (p. 28 of the Mortality Statistics of the Census Office for 1907):

Country.	1903	1904	1905	1906
Ceylon	25.9	24.9	27.7	24.3
Hungary	26.1	24.8	27.8	24.8
Roumania	24.8	24.4	25.4	.....
Spain	25	25.8	25.9	26.2
Austria	23.8	23.7	25	.....
Italy	22.4	21.1	21.9	20.8
Japan	20	21.2	21.9	.....
France	19.2	19.4	19.6	19.9
German Empire	20	19.6	19.8	.....
United States	16.1	16.6	16.2	16.1
Netherlands	15.6	15.9	15.3	14.8
Norway	14.8	14.3	14.8	13.7
Denmark	14.7	14.1	15	13.5
United Kingdom	15.8	16.5	15.5	15.6
Australasia	11.8	10.8	10.5	10.6
New Zealand	10.4	9.6	9.3	9.3

There is no table which has ever been read in this body that has such vital significance as that table, which shows that if the people of the United States took the same pains to preserve the life of the Nation that New Zealand has done, we would save over six to the thousand; and, measured by our 80,000,000 people, it would mean a saving to this country of over 500,000 lives annually. Pittsburgh is no exception in the exposure of human life to bad conditions. It is merely illustrative.

The policy of New Zealand is expressed in their great motto, "Better reduce want than increase wealth"; and when you reduce want, even if it be at the expense of increasing wealth, you prolong human life. You make life worthy to be lived, and you raise the standard of men physically, morally, and spiritually.

Let our national standard be, "Men first, then wealth."

New Zealand has abolished monopoly and given a more even distribution of the opportunities of life to willing labor than any other country in the world, and it offers to the United States an example of how to care for its people, because the difference of these vital statistics of an average of 9.9 deaths per annum out of a thousand and 16.3 per thousand, makes a difference of 6.4 per thousand, or the vast multitude of 512,000 people who annually die in the United States in excess of the deaths that would occur under more favorable conditions of life. Are they not worth preserving as fully as we agree on the conservation of our other national resources?

The death rates in our cities, especially the industrial cities, seems to run still higher than the general average; for example, the annual average number of deaths from all causes per thousand population for 1901 to 1905 was as follows (id., pp. 91 and 92):

In Massachusetts:
Boston	18.8
Fall River	20.3
Lowell	20.2
Providence, R. I.	18.8
New York City	19.0
Pittsburgh, Pa.	20.7
Philadelphia	18.2
Norristown, Pa.	24.5

Notwithstanding the fact that the cities with their opportunity of cooperation in improved water supply, sewerage, hospital service, and sanitary supervision ought to have better health than those less favorably situated. The heavy death rate in cities is due to the extreme high death rate among the very poor, who are compelled to live in insanitary places and are otherwise exposed, while the more favored population of the cities would show a better rate than the average.

TABLE 21.—Death rates from all causes per 1,000 population in registration States in 1900.

Connecticut	169.77
Maine	174.93
Massachusetts	177.36
Michigan	138.67
New Hampshire	179.79
New Jersey	173.78
New York	179.21
Rhode Island	190.78
Vermont	169.62

Table 95, Abstract of the Census, 1900, shows a heavy mortality in manufacturing cities and in cities where negroes live. For example, per thousand, from all causes:

Augusta, Me.	26.4
Baltimore, Md.	21.0
Biddeford, Me.	23.2
Boston, Mass.	21.1
Cincinnati, Ohio	19.1
Hoboken, N. J.	21.1
Jersey City, N. J.	20.7
Philadelphia, Pa.	21.2

The Census Bulletin No. 77 gives an interesting account of 42 of the so-called "dusty trades," showing, for example, that of polishers who die between 25 and 34 years, 56 per cent of such deaths are due to consumption. That the per cent of like deaths due to consumption in each age group is very high; for example, between the ages of 25 and 34 years, 70 per cent of the grinders who die, die of consumption; 59 per cent of the tool makers, 50 per cent of the gold-leaf makers, 50 per cent of brass workers, 56 per cent of printers, 66 per cent of compositors, 61 per cent of engravers, 52 per cent of stone workers, 50 per cent of marble workers, 56 per cent of glass blowers, 46 per cent of glass cutters, 44 per cent of plasterers, 49 per cent of paper hangers, 62 per cent of lithographers, 68 per cent of the hosiery and knitting mill employees, 50 per cent of spinners, 53 per cent of weavers, 50 per cent of rope makers, 55 per cent of cabinetmakers, 62 per cent of wood turners, 55 per cent of hatters, 52 per cent of silk-mill employees, 58 per cent of upholsterers, showing that workers in these dusty trades are very liable to die of tuberculosis.

This table shows that the exposure of human life to dust and hard conditions leads to the destruction of human life by tuberculosis in a serious way. I think these tables are of interest.

Mr. President, I deem it my duty to call the attention of the country to the fact that this death rate stands in startling contrast to the death rate of New Zealand, where the average for 1901 to 1906 was less than 10 deaths per thousand. It is equally important, in considering the reason for the greater security of life in New Zealand, to remember that in New Zealand the people take great care to prevent the destruction of human life by the extremes of poverty.

Finally, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in New Zealand great pains is taken to protect the people against monopoly, against the appropriation of everything in heaven and on earth, everything visible or invisible by men, because they happen to have piled up available credit at their command. In New Zealand they believe that the land was made for the use and benefit of the living generation, who make it desirable to live in. Therefore they control monopoly in that great Republic. We have copied them before in their political processes when we adopted the greatest of all means for the control of fraud in elections by the adoption of the Australian ballot, and we will do well to imitate them in other matters, where they protect the living generation against the uncontrolled and natural ambition and greed of man for wealth and power.

BETTER REDUCE WANT THAN INCREASE WEALTH.

In New Zealand they do not impose a tariff tax artfully drawn to make the poor poorer and the rich richer. In New Zealand they do not establish a tariff under the false pretense of raising revenue, where the legislator openly or secretly intends the tariff rate not to raise revenue, but to prevent importation, to prevent competition, and to protect monopoly in the home market.

THE PURPOSES OF TAXATION.

Constitutionally, a tax can have no other basis than the raising of a revenue for public purposes, and whatever governmental exaction has not this basis is tyrannical and unlawful. A tax on imports, therefore, the purpose of which is not to raise a revenue, but to discourage and indirectly prohibit some particular import for the benefit of some home manufacture, may well be questioned as being merely colorable, and therefore not warranted by constitutional principles. (Cooley, Prin. Con. Law, 57.)

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the Topeka case, said:

"To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called 'taxation.' This is not legislation; it is a decree under legislative forms." (20 Wall., 664, in Loan Asso. v. Topeka.)

New Zealand pursues the policy and imposes a 10 per cent inheritance tax on estates of one hundred thousand and more, and imposes also an income tax.

New Zealand does not hesitate to protect her working units from excessive house rent, providing concrete houses at a low rate of interest.

I am not unaware of the fact that this latter suggestion will furnish occasion to the clamorous advocates of special privileges to burst into a chorus of denunciation against New Zealand, that this is socialism. It is true that it is socialistic. But no wise policy should be condemned by a mere epithet "socialism," for our post-office system and common-school system, and munipical waterworks, sewers, and streets system are "socialistic." New Zealand believes that the land upon which the New Zealanders live and move and have their being ought not to be monopolized by the very rich, nor used by them through the acquirement of titles to dictate terms upon which the New Zealanders shall be allowed to live.

The New Zealanders must be a very foolish people. They actually believe that the land upon which they live should be controlled in the interest of the living generation of men who cultivate it and make it beautiful. I understand that this foolish doctrine is contrary to the fundamental canons of monopoly.

It violates the fundamental law of Continental Europe and of Great Britain. It would overthrow the idea of the good old days of William the Conqueror when he took charge of Britain and parceled the lands among his warlike leaders.

These titles have thence come down in the good old way, and the dukes and princes of England, and of Germany, of Austria, and of Russia still hold the titles and in measure still impose their will upon the inhabitants thereof. It is also true that this special class of landed nobles, who exercised monopoly of the land, having finally learned that they could only eat so much and only wear so much and only occupy a given number of palaces were obliged to throw out the younger brothers of each succeeding family, and, human selfishness having become satiated in princely and luxurious living, have turned themselves to some extent to the service of their fellow-men. But they have had the wisdom and been compelled to limit the extortion which their legal rights made possible.

Indeed, they had a great example in France, which was serviceable in teaching them not to go too far. It was this monopoly of land—the Senator from New York [Mr. Depew] to the contrary notwithstanding—which caused the French revolution, sending the land monopolists to the guillotine, and resulted in the minute subdivision of the lands of France among those who tilled the soil and made it productive.

Mr. President, one might be misunderstood in discussing the greed of modern times. I do not blame an individual for exhibiting the natural tendency of human life. I do not blame a man for becoming greedy for wealth and power; all of us have these impulses; but I do blame the laws which persist in sheltering him at the expense of those who are entitled to protection in the constitutional right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

I wish to call attention to what is the effect of monopoly. Monopoly is worse in Europe than in our country because under the rule in Europe the land was monopolized in the first place by imperial power, and the control of the land was handed down to dukes, princes, and various others, and those people who come to our shores and are willing to submit to any kind of treatment do so because they come from conditions of monopoly more severe than those which we have in our own country.

It was the monopoly of land which led to the French revolution, notwithstanding the comments of the Senator from New York, who attributed it to other reasons. Thomas Jefferson, when minister to France in 1785, pointed out the terrific effect of land monopoly in that Empire. He said:

The property of France is absolutely concentrated in a very few hands, having revenues of from half a million of guineas a year downward. These employ the flower of the country as servants, some of them having as many as 200 domestics, not laboring. They employ also a great number of manufacturers and tradesmen, and, lastly, the class of laboring husbandmen. But, after all, there comes the most numerous of all the classes: that is, the poor, who can not find work. I asked myself what could be the reason that so many should be permitted to beg who are willing to work in a country where there is a very considerable proportion of uncultivated lands? Those lands are undistributed only for the sake of game. It should seem, then, that it must be because of the enormous wealth of the proprietors, which places them above attention to the increase of their revenues by permitting these lands to be labored.

I have always felt sorry for the French nobility, for the so-called "flower of France," and have wondered why it was they were incapable of realizing the fatal danger which their greed, their extravagance, and their frivolity engendered. They played with a powder magazine of human passion which finally exploded.

Our laws should protect the people in the peaceful enjoyment of life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and of the fruits of their own industry. If the laws fail, there will be built up in this country a powder magazine of human passion that may some day explode with fatal consequences.

A safety valve has been furnished, for possible danger to the land monopolist and other thence engendered monopolists of continental Europe, by modern transportation, which has permitted their great surplus of population to go to other parts of the world and build up homes by their peaceful labor, where they would not be subject to princes or potentates or to tyranny in any form, whether governmental, religious, or plutocratic; and our forefathers came to this land to free themselves from this tyranny and to establish a government whose fundamental doctrine was that the precious privileges of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness were inalienable. That is to say, Mr. President, the individual could not deprive himself of them if he would; that he had no right to deprive himself of these things.

It has remained for the representatives of the people in Congress to permit the dangers of monopoly to grow up by special privileges granted by statute, by building up a monopoly breeding tariff, by which foreign competition has been cut off and home competition controlled and commercial mastery of our people established by the organization of trusts, by secret agreements, and by gigantic mergers, which embraced in one corporate body every competitor.

Mr. President, there is no evil to a free people more dangerous in every way than financial and commercial monopoly.

When a monopoly is organized strong enough to dictate the prices of the product of labor, or to dictate the prices of the necessaries of life to the laborer and the entire people, there has also been established a commercial master on the one side and a commercial slavery on the other. The Standard Oil Co., which fixes the price of crude oil to the producer and fixes the price of kerosene and gasoline to the consumer, regardless of values either to one or the other, exercises a commercial mastery that differs in degree, but does not differ in kind, with the mastery which Paraoh exercised over the Egyptians when he established a monopoly in corn in Egypt.

Mr. President, under the advice of Joseph, Pharaoh and his captains stored all the surplus corn of Egypt during seven years of plenty. They exercised their legal rights. During the seven years of drought which followed they had the richest monopoly recorded in history.

The price of corn went up; the price of corn went sky-high under this monopoly of the home market. The Holy Bible advises us that, in exchange for enough of this monopolized product—

Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought. * * *

And when money failed in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came unto Joseph and said, "Give us bread, for why should we die in thy presence? for the money faileth."

And Joseph said, "Give your cattle; and I will give you for your cattle, if money fail."

And they brought their cattle unto Joseph, and Joseph gave them bread in exchange for horses, and for the flocks, and for the cattle of the herds, and for the asses.

And the Egyptians then gave up to this triumphant monopoly all of their land in exchange for corn for bread.

And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, for the Egyptians sold every man his field because the famine prevailed over them, so the land became Pharaoh's.

Then Joseph said unto the people, "Behold I have bought you this day, and your land for Pharaoh: lo, here is seed for you, and ye shall sow the land.

"And it shall come to pass in the increase, that ye shall give the fifth part unto Pharaoh, and four parts shall be your own, for seed of the field, and for your food, and for them of your households, and for food for your little ones."

Mr. President, we probably in this day of greater liberty and greater enlightenment would rise in revolution against the dictation of Pharaoh in this form, but the practice upon which Pharaoh acted, the principle upon which he established a monopoly in a necessary of life by the exercise of his legal rights and thereby acquired, by mastery of prices, all of the property of the Egyptians and made them his commercial servants and slaves, are in full play in this Republic under the operation of a thousand varieties of monopolies, dictating prices upon all of the necessaries of life and gradually absorbing, I may say, Mr. President, rapidly absorbing, all of the property of this Republic.

Pharaoh and his captains gave the Egyptians four-fifths of what they produced. The present masters of monopoly do not give to labor so large a part of what it produces. I have demonstrated by Exhibit 1 the wages paid as compared to the value of the gross product, and have demonstrated by those tables that taking the raw materials at the factory and calculating the additional value created directly by labor, it does not receive one-half of the value it actually creates, much less four-fifths, which was the rule established by Pharaoh.

Mr. President, it may seem austere to recall the monopoly of Pharaoh, but I think it very important that the Senate of the United States should consider and feel itself more actively responsible for the development and care of the interest of the productive masses of the Republic. I have no desire to hold the leaders of the Republican Party responsible for the drift of modern times. I shall be content to see them exert themselves to retain its good features and restrain its bad features.

I am willing to exculpate them. I will be very glad to see them take advantage of a great opportunity to make themselves permanently the representatives of the people if they will only give those things to the people which they are in honor bound to give to enable them to enjoy life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and the fruits of their own industry, which are now filched from them by prices 50 per cent higher than the prices of the world.

WHO IS GETTING ALL THE NET PRODUCTS OF LABOR IN THIS COUNTRY?

Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious to thoughtful men that the tremendous accumulation of wealth in a few hands is leading to the rapid monopolization of every natural opportunity. Nearly all of our national transportation is so controlled. There is obvious control by monopoly of telegraph, telephone, the express, of lumber, of building material, of coal, of cotton manufactures and woolen manufactures, of farm machinery, of oil, of iron, of steel and their products; and on the other hand we have a rather pitiful condition of extreme poverty exhibiting itself in all of our great cities, side by side with this enormous concentration of wealth.

Mr. President, I believe we have the best people in the world; that even our masters of monopoly have shown a greater measure of liberality in their gigantic benefactions to the people from whom their fortunes have been drawn than any men in the history of the world. I rejoice in their benevolence. I know that they are neither hard-hearted nor lacking in generous impulse; they have simply been following the rules of business established by a rigorous commercial age, where "dividends" were emblazoned on every battle flag and "success"—"financial success"—was the only standard. It is no wonder that the weak and the poor and the inarticulate mass have been forgotten in the fierce contest for wealth and power.

We have a wonderful country and a great and magnificent people. We have a great mass of the middle classes of people, who are not in penury, have neither riches nor poverty, but comprise the bulwark of this Republic, whose patriotism, whose wisdom, whose penetrating intelligence can be perfectly relied upon; and the petty larceny of the two millions of our revenue by the Sugar Trust, to which they pleaded guilty in New York within the last few days, being but a trivial circumstance beside the universal plundering of the national pocketbook by the wholesale fraudulent prices fixed by the monopolies of this country, our great middle class, conservative and sound, will soon correct these evils at the ballot box.

I am deeply disappointed that the party in power has apparently lost its opportunity to serve the people by removing the tariff wall sheltering monopoly and by lowering prices in the United States.

MONOPOLY HAS SUBJECTED LABOR TO IRREGULAR EMPLOYMENT.

The panic of 1907 was caused by monopoly and by the dangerous plutocracy our system has erected in the United States, as I fully set forth on February 25, 1908. This panic threw out of employment millions of men, two millions of whom are out of employment now, according to the recent report of Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, from whose report I quote:

Permit me to call attention to this: At the beginning of December, 1908, I sent out a circular letter to the executive officers of a number of international trade-unions of America and got from them a report as to the state of employment and unemployment, and from the reports which were made to me within 15 or 20 days I culled the following information:

The blacksmiths report during the past year about 50 per cent of the trade unemployed; those employed averaging about four days a week.
Boiler makers and iron-ship builders, 30 per cent unemployed.
Boot and shoe workers, 25 per cent unemployed.
Bridge and structural-iron workers, 25 per cent unemployed.
Carpenters and joiners, 40 per cent unemployed.
Wood carvers, 30 per cent unemployed.
Cement workers, 30 per cent unemployed.
Cigar makers, 10 per cent unemployed.
Commercial telegraphers, 15 per cent unemployed.
Coopers, 15 per cent unemployed; two-thirds of the employed working half time.
Elevator constructors, 40 per cent unemployed.
Steam and hot-water fitters, employment in the West fair; in the East fully 40 per cent unemployed and working about 180 days a year.
Freight handlers, about 30 per cent unemployed.
Glass-bottle blowers, about 20 per cent unemployed. On account of conditions of the trade, no work is performed during July or August.
Window-glass blowers, 20 per cent unemployed.
Granite cutters, about 15 per cent unemployed.
Hatters, men working about three-fourths time.
Hod carriers and building laborers, 60 per cent unemployed.
Hotel and restaurant employees, 30 per cent unemployed.
Machinists, 20 per cent unemployed.
Railway maintenance-of-way employees, 25 per cent unemployed.
Butcher workmen, 40 per cent unemployed.
Coal miners, work about 200 days during the year.
Painters and decorators, 70 per cent unemployed.
Pattern makers, 30 per cent unemployed.
Pavers and rammer men, 25 per cent unemployed.
Printing pressmen, 20 per cent unemployed.
Shipwrights, joiners, and caikers, 50 per cent unemployed.
Tile layers, "state of employment very poor."
Tin-plate workers, 40 per cent unemployed.
Tobacco workers, working on two-thirds time.
Iron molders, 70 per cent unemployed.

I am sure it is not an exaggeration to say that there are now in our country, and have been with little variation since October, 1907, nearly 2,000,000 of wage earners unemployed.

Secretary STRAUS. Do you mean by that that before that period those 2,000,000 were employed?

Mr. GOMPERS. I do, sir.

Secretary STRAUS. Are there not always some unemployed?

Mr. GOMPERS. In some trades, some callings, and seasons, yes, sir; but up to October, 1907, and for a few years just prior thereto it was a practical fact that any man who could work could find work to do. I refer to the condition now of the men who want to work and who can find no work to do.

It is probably one of the greatest tributes that can be paid to all our people—and I think in a great measure that credit belongs to the organized workers, organized labor—that during that whole period of nearly 18 months and two winters, with so vast a number of unemployed, life and property have been secure and public order has been maintained; and I know of no force in all our country so potent as a conservator of the public peace as the much-abused and maligned labor organizations. In this morning's papers we read of a demonstration of the unemployed in Berlin yesterday, where the sabers of the soldiery were drawn to disperse hungry crowds. It is set forth in the cablegrams that the unemployed there proposed socialistic remedies for relief. I do not know of what those remedies or propositions for relief consisted. I take it that any proposition coming from the poor crowd of fellows who want work or relief would be regarded as extremely radical. But the American workmen ask for no relief that can at all be construed as socialistic. The relief which we ask for the men and women of our country who have been walking the streets in idleness for 18 months we ask upon high patriotic, practical, and humane grounds and for good economic reasons. I know, of course, that we are often met when these matters are presented with the statement that they are paternalistic and that our form of government does not admit of the Government undertaking projects that would smack of paternalism. Yet in the great calamity which overtook the people of Italy quite recently the Government of our country generously and promptly appropriated $800,000 as the direct gift of the American people as a whole—this in addition to the many generous contributions of our people in their individual capacity. No word of adverse criticism has been indulged in. On the contrary, the appropriation of this vast sum of money was looked upon as a duty which in common humanity the people of our country owed to a stricken people. It is only referred to to illustrate the thought that the lingering hunger and misery due to the unemployment of our people, brought about by forces entirely beyond their control, should receive consideration at the hands of our Government, both national and State.

THE MONOPOLY PROHIBITIVE TARIFF HAS EXPOSED AMERICAN LABOR TO TYRANNY.

Mr. President, the monopolies established under the prohibitive tariff have almost entirely destroyed the organizations of labor among their employees and have driven out in large measure the liberty-loving Americans and have introduced in their place foreigners who know but little of liberty—Slovaks, Bulgarians, Hungarians, Poles, Greeks, Italians.

The American workman has been subjected to foreign pauper competition; he has been refused the right to organize for his own protection.

He has been denied his political liberty.

He has been compelled to march in political parades against his will.

He has been compelled to vote against his conscience under the threat of being discharged or denied the opportunity of working for his living.

THE DEFENSE OF THESE SCHEDULE UNSOUND.

Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, on June 4, made the only defense which has been offered of these high schedules, and in discussing the matter he said:

In general, it may be stated that the wages of textile operatives in America are double those of England, France, and Germany. A very exhaustive inquiry has recently been made into the subject of wages by the British Board of Trade, which shows that in Germany the wages of cotton weavers run from 16s. 6d. to 19s. 6d., or from $4.12 to $4.87 per week; that in France the wages run from 16s. 10d. to 19s. 2d., or from $4.20 to $4.79 per week; that in Great Britain the wages run from 16s. to 24s. 11d., or from $4 to $6.22 per week.

For the United States the Bureau of Labor, in Bulletin No. 77, July, 1908, shows that the average wages of all cotton weavers for the year 1907 was $9.74. In addition, I may state that in many of the fine yarn mills of New England making high-priced fancy fabrics the weavers earn from $11 to $13 per week.

Many of the fabrics that will be dutiable under these provisions are valued at a dollar a pound. The cost of the cotton is 20 cents a pound at the outside, leaving 80 cents a pound for cost of labor in various forms in this country. Suppose that that labor costs twice as much in the cotton-manufacturing States of the United States as it does in our competing countries abroad, it is easy to see by a mathematical calculation that 50 per cent ad valorem, to say nothing about 45 per cent, will not equalize the conditions on these various high-priced goods between our own and competing countries.

If this was an original proposition, and we were to submit to the Senate rates which were protective and adequate, in view of the difference in the cost of production, we could not make them any lower than those fixed in these specific rates which we have asked the Senate to adopt.

The chairman takes the wages of the cotton weavers of Germany, France, and Great Britain for 1905, reported by the British Board of Trade to Parliament, just after the panic, and compares these wages with the weavers in the United States for 1907, and withholds the statement made in the report from which he quotes that the wages of ribbon weavers at St. Etienne, France, was twice as great in 1906 as in 1905 and 50 per cent higher in 1907 than in 1905.

The chairman does not point out that the spinners, both male and female, in the United States, by these same tables, were paid less wages in the cotton industry in the United States than they were in Germany or France. The male spinners received $4.12 a week in the United States, $5.91 in France, and $6.57 in Germany, and the spinners in the woolen industries were paid $6.52 in the United States, $6.22 to $6.81 in France, and $7.20 to $7.79 in Germany. The foreign weavers were paid less than our weavers, and the foreign spinners were paid more than our spinners, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance withholds this important fact.

It is impossible to follow a leadership that is either careless or inaccurate in making statements for the guidance of the Senate. The chairman has withheld information from this body, and the quotations he offers, being a partial truth, are wholly untrustworthy and misleading.

Mr. President, this is the only defense that has been made, and in effect it amounts to this, that a pound of fabric of cotton costs 20 cents a pound for the cotton and 80 cents a pound for the cost of labor.

The chairman proves too much; he leaves nothing for capital. The statement is obviously false. He leaves nothing for capital, for the enormous dividends paid by the cotton mills of his State.

He is flatly contradicted by the census, which shows that the total labor cost in the entire textile industry is 19.5 per cent of the gross value of the product.

He is flatly contradicted in his contention by the census reports as to every schedule.

He is flatly contradicted by Carroll D. Wright's report on relative labor cost in 446 individual cases.

The aggregate value of the products of cotton mills for 1900 was $332,806,156 (vol. 10, Table 14). The materials used cost $116,108,879 (Table 13), and the total wages (Table 9) amounted to $86,689,752, and for cotton small wares amounted to $63,194.

Total cost	$332,806,155
Material cost	$116,108,879
Total wages	$86,689,752
Per cent of labor to gross product	26
Average per cent of tariff rate fixed by the Senate bill	47.14

Approximately twice as much as the total wages paid the American workmen, thus sheltering the manufacturer in monopoly by excluding foreign goods.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance, in the face of these census reports, rises in his place as an expert and tells this Senate that the labor cost of these manufacturers is 80 per cent, when the truth is 26 per cent, and he justifies the cotton schedules upon this gross and indefensible error.

Granting that foreign goods have no labor cost whatever, 26 per cent is the maximum schedule to protect the American workmen; 26 per cent is the maximum average rate required if the Republican platform is to be carried out of providing the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

If the labor cost abroad is one-half the labor cost in the United States, the rate required to prevent the foreign manufacturer from having the advantage in cheaper labor would be 26 per cent, the American cost, less 13 per cent, the European cost, or a net rate of 13 per cent.

The difference in the labor cost at home and abroad would therefore be 13 per cent and not 47 per cent, as the schedule is written.

Mr. President, the gross error, to use the mildest terms possible, of the Committee on Finance and the advocates of a prohibitive tariff runs in like manner through other schedules, the proof of which I submit. Taking the table of the committee itself in print No. 3 of April 12, 1909, page 68, I place side by side with the proposed ad valorem rate the total percentage of labor cost to the value of the product, the proof of which will be found in Exhibit 1, taken from the census reports, and in the volumes on manufactures, of census, 1900, and is verified by the figures of the Committee on Finance giving wages and the value of products in columns 8 and 9.

I ask attention to the recapitulation compiled by the Committee on Finance April 12, 1909, and ask permission to print that table with an interlineation which I have placed in it showing, from the figures submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Finance in that table, what is the percentage of wages to value of product as shown in 1904.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Industries with products named in two or more schedules are credited to the schedule which includes the major product. The value of products for each group is the sum of all products of all industries in the group, and hence includes a large amount of duplication due to the product of one industry serving as material for another.

[6] Should be $1,495,686,437 (see p. 67).

[7] Should be $2,277,838,543.

[8] Should be $13,270,192,088.

SCHEDULE A—CHEMICALS, ETC.

Mr. OWEN. This table shows that the percentage of labor to the value of the product in Schedule A, for example, by the very figures given by the Finance Committee itself, is only 7.5 per cent, while the proposed schedule is 28 per cent—four times as high as the entire labor cost involved in the product.

SCHEDULE B—GLASSWARE, ETC.

In like manner in Schedule B the total labor cost is 36 per cent. The total labor cost in Europe, if it were half as much, would leave the net difference in labor cost only 18 per cent, while the proposed tariff is 48 per cent for Schedule B.

SCHEDULE C—METALS, ETC.

In like manner, Schedule C exhibits a total labor cost of 20 per cent. The difference in this labor cost and the European labor cost, accepting the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Finance that the labor cost in Europe is only half as much, would be 10 per cent, and the difference in labor cost for which the protection might be required would not exceed 10 per cent, but the proposed rate is 31 per cent—three times as high as it ought to be for protective purposes.

SCHEDULE D—WOOD, ETC.

In Schedule D the total labor cost is 27 per cent, and the difference in labor cost in this country and abroad would be 13½ per cent, not counting freight, which would be as much more in favor of this heavy material; and here the proposed rate is 11 per cent, and this schedule ought to be absolutely free in order to protect our forest and conserve our natural resources otherwise, as well as supply our people with cheap building material and our publishers with cheap paper.

SCHEDULE E—SUGAR, ETC.

In Schedule E, sugar, and so forth, the labor cost is 5.6 per cent; the difference in labor cost would be less than 3 per cent, which would be more than offset by freight; and here the proposed duty is 65 per cent, giving a complete monopoly to the Sugar Trust, which takes nearly all the profit, leaving a small fraction of the profit to the sugar planter.

SCHEDULE F—TOBACCO, ETC.

The total percentage of labor cost in tobacco manufacture is 18.9 per cent. The difference in this country and abroad, taking the word of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, would be approximately 9½ per cent; the ad valorem rate of the Senate bill is 87 per cent.

SCHEDULE G—AGRICULTURAL, ETC.

Here the labor cost is 4.5 per cent; the difference in labor cost could not possibly equal the freight, and these products might as well be free, with some very minor exceptions, even from a standpoint of absolute protection.

But instead of corresponding with the rate required to protect, the rate is put at 32 per cent, which is perfectly silly, and should not deceive the most stupid man that ever plowed a furrow. For example, the tariff on corn is 15 cents a bushel (par. 227), and the total amount imported in 1907 was 9,000 bushels, and the amount raised was 2,595,320,000 bushels.

And the farmers of the country are flattered with 15 cents a bushel tax to keep the pauper labor of Europe from running them out of their cornfields. The American farmer who does not see the hypocrisy of this schedule and the profound contempt which it exhibits for his intelligence is assuredly incapable of reason.

SCHEDULE I—COTTON MANUFACTURES.

The labor cost in cotton manufactures, according to the figures of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, is 21.4 per cent. The difference in the labor cost in the United States and abroad would be between 10 and 11 per cent. The schedule is put at 47 per cent.

SCHEDULE J—FLAX, ETC.

In like manner the difference in the cost of labor in the production of flax, hemp, and jute goods is 7 per cent. The schedule is 44 per cent.

SCHEDULE K—WOOL, ETC.

The difference in the cost of production measured by labor in this country and abroad is about 8 per cent. The tariff is 58 per cent.

SCHEDULE L—SILK, ETC.

Silk and silk goods: The difference in labor cost of production is 10 per cent, but the proposed tariff is 60 per cent, so as to insure a monopoly.

SCHEDULE M—PAPER, ETC.

Pulp, paper, and books: In this schedule the difference in the labor cost of production at home and abroad is between 11 and 12 per cent. The tariff schedule is 21 per cent.

SCHEDULE N—SUNDRIES.

And, finally, in sundries the difference of labor cost in this country and abroad is 9 per cent, while the Committee on Finance imposed an equivalent ad valorem of 23 per cent.

I challenge the chairman of the Committee on Finance to answer this exhibit, and invite him to use all of his experts, and to put on the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD his answer, where it may be critically examined by the scholars of the country.

I charge him before the country and before the eyes of civilized mankind with writing these schedules, under the pretense of protecting the American workingman, far above the total cost of the labor in the gross product, which would not be justified even if the percentage of labor cost in similar articles abroad was absolutely nothing. But granted that the labor cost abroad is one-half of what it is in the United States, I put in this table the maximum average rate, thus measuring the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and call the attention of the country to it.

The defense of these monopoly protecting schedules has been as remarkable as the schedules themselves. To my inquiry as to why the rates were not adjusted to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, the first defense was that of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the inquiry as to what was the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad was absurd.

Mr. President, I have demonstrated that the answer of the Senator from New Hampshire is itself absurd, if it were offered in perfect good faith, as I am sure it was.

The next answer would appear to come from the Senator from Massachusetts, who, having explained a question I did not ask, saw fit to suggest he could not give the Senator from Oklahoma the understanding with which to comprehend, and when I succeeded in enabling him to understand my question he confessed that he was not prepared to answer it.

The Senator from Rhode Island, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, whose genuine good temper at least I always admire, suggested as a proper answer to my inquiry that I was "new to the Senate," a polite way of suggesting a lack of learning and understanding which is commonly practiced by the managers of the Committee on Committees when they can not answer intelligently an embarrassing question.

The Senator from Montana, another one of the able defendants of this totally indefensible bill, with its monopoly-protecting schedules, thought it a sufficient answer to suggest that the Senator from Oklahoma could not expect to be furnished with intelligence.

Mr. President, I invite the defenders of this bill to put upon the face of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an answer to these tables which I have submitted, showing the relative labor cost of our manufactures and the gross disparity of the schedules they submit in comparison with the lower rates which would properly measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

The proponents of these schedules, in my opinion, can not answer my objections without putting themselves to utter confusion, if they answer in a spirit of perfect moral and intellectual integrity and frankness, because it contains a multitude of items which are practically prohibitive, which produce no revenue worth mentioning, and has resulted necessarily in the exclusion of foreign competition, followed by combinations in restraint of trade and the establishment of monopoly prices—charging the people too much for what they buy from monopoly and paying them too little for what they sell to monopoly. This is why the Republican organization pledged itself to revise the tariff and made the people believe it would be a downward revision.

I give a table of examples of these prohibitive duties, together with the paragraph of the bill, duty, the revenue, and the table from which the information is drawn.

These are but a few of the items which might be multiplied indefinitely.

EXHIBIT 14.

It should be remembered that in products of wholesale international use our imports may be prevented by a small tax where it makes the imports unprofitable, so that the prohibitive rates which average just high enough to prevent competition, as shown by the table below, serve as a great check to international commerce and lower the amount of revenue which we ought to receive under a system of liberal imports and exports.

The trivial reductions claimed to have been made by the Senate bill as amended are of no consequence, because the rates lowered were so far above the prohibitive point that lowering the rates leaves them still prohibitive and reminds me of the quotation of my colleague from Macbeth:

> Then be these juggling fiends no more believed,
> Who palter with us in a double sense,
> Who keep the word of promise to our ear,
> And break it to our hope.

TAXING RAW MATERIALS INJURIOUS TO AMERICAN MANUFACTURERS AND NATIONAL COMMERCE.

Mr. President, when we tax by the tariff the materials needed by our manufacturers, whether such materials are raw materials or partly in the process of manufacture, we put our American manufacturers at a serious disadvantage in competing with foreign manufacturers in the markets of the United States and obstruct our own commercial expansion.

Foreign countries provide their manufacturers in large degree with free raw material, and therefore with cheaper materials needed for manufacture. Foreign manufacturers have, therefore, this advantage over our manufacturers in competing for the markets. Taxing raw materials used by our manufacturers will, for this reason, limit our foreign exports of manufactured goods. This means limiting the production of American factories. This means restricting the number of our workmen, lessening the demand for their labor, lowering their wages, and, what is more, means also a smaller output and a consequent greater cost to the consumer—over and above the increased cost imposed by higher raw materials—for the reason that the greater the output the more economic the production.

Cheaper material means a greater foreign market for American productions; it means increased demand for American labor; it means higher wages for American labor; and it means cheaper prices for American consumers, always believing, as I believe, that the artificial prices now fixed by monopoly will be in due season abated.

American manufacturers are at a further disadvantage because they sell to foreigners the goods needed in more advanced manufactures cheaper than they do to each other within our own borders. Because of this, millions of capital created by American labor is going abroad to get the advantage of these cheaper prices and to employ, not American workmen, but foreign workmen. (See North's report.)

ANY OBSTRUCTION TO COMMERCE LIMITS THE OPPORTUNITIES FOR THE LEGITIMATE EMPLOYMENT OF BOTH CAPITAL AND LABOR.

Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that, having provided a tariff high enough to equal "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," so as to put our manufacturers on a perfect level with the manufacturers of foreign lands in the cost of production, that any further tax upon our imports or our exports, or upon their imports or exports is merely a barrier to a free interchange of commerce, limiting both our commerce and their commerce.

There is a very important factor in commerce separate and apart from the question of equality of cost. We import woolen goods, cotton goods, silk goods, and we export goods of the same material to the very countries from which we import such goods. The factor entering into the proposition is not one of cold economy alone, for it obviously would be more economical to buy our woolen goods in our own country and save the difference of freight and the same thing would be true for the Europeans—that it would be better for them to keep their goods at home from a standpoint purely of economy.

But the question of economy is not the only factor controlling or guiding exports and imports. It is a question of taste and of personal fancy that causes Americans to buy French, Scotch, or English goods, and which causes the Scotch, English, and French to buy American goods. We enlarge their markets by buying their stuff. They enlarge our markets by buying our stuff. We increase the demand for their labor; they increase the demand for our labor; and we export no more than we import, for the volume of our exports is determined by the volume of our imports (using these terms to cover credits and expenditures).

VOLUME OF EXPORTS CONTROLLED BY VOLUME OF IMPORTS.

This question can be reduced to a mathematical demonstration, properly interpreted. It is only necessary to take the unit of the export or of the import to determine this question. When the American exports $100,000 worth of goods in any form, whether in cotton bales or in cotton cloth, he receives from his foreign customer a hundred thousand dollars in money, or credit, which he may convert at his will into cash or into goods, and his export will be balanced with an import or its mercantile equivalent in cash, in credit, or expenditure abroad, or with work performed, as in carrying freights, and so forth.

A vast multitude of such transactions do not alter this substantial truth. It merely enlarges and emphasizes it, and it may be taken as a sound commercial maxim that our exports are balanced by our imports and our imports are balanced by our exports, and when we obstruct our imports we obstruct our exports, and thereby diminish the world's demand for the goods of our manufacturers; we thereby diminish the world's demand for the products of American labor; we thereby diminish the demand for American labor; we thereby diminish the employment of American labor and lower the wages of American labor.

BALANCE OF TRADE.

[Giffen Essays in Finance, 161.]

Tables showing the balance of trade are apt to mislead men. For example, our statistics will exhibit in one column our imports, in another column our exports, and the balance is called the "balance of trade." If we have exports more than we have imports in these tables the balance of trade is said to be in our favor.

This conclusion of the balance being in our favor is unmitigated nonsense. Whenever we ship goods from the United States we get what our citizens regard as the equivalent, in cash, credits, or other property.

He who attempts to draw any conclusion whatever as to a nation's wealth or poverty from the mere fact of a favorable or unfavorable balance of trade has not grasped the first fundamental principle of political economy. (R. T. Ely, Problems of To-day, p. 28.)

The plain truth is our statistics, showing merely "exports" and "imports," do not and can not take into account our credits abroad or the credits of foreigners in the United States.

They do not and they can not take into account the payment by the United States of exceding $100,000,000 annually for ocean-going freight and passengers carried exclusively in foreign bottoms. These tables can not take into account expenditures of citizens of the United States abroad, which probably exceed $100,000,000 per annum.

These tables do not take into account millions of dollars shipped abroad by foreigners working in the United States.

These tables do not take into account numerous foreign investments made by citizens of the United States in foreign lands and by foreigners in our land.

These tables do not take into account even the transfer of great estates from the United States abroad by international marriages.

The plain truth, which can not be disputed without stultification, is this, that for every export we receive its equivalent in cash or credit, and for every import we pay in cash or credit.

The available gold in the world, which is the basis of what we call "cash," is a comparatively small amount. The total gold in the United States amounted to one thousand five hundred and ninety-three millions December 31, 1906. (Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1907, p. 742.)

The annual production of gold in the world amounted to four hundred millions in 1906. Germany had over a thousand millions in gold and France about a thousand millions in gold and the British Empire about a thousand millions in gold in 1906, and all of the gold money on earth combined did not exceed seven billions.

No thoughtful man will pretend that we can pursue a policy by which our exports would be paid in gold and not paid in the goods and credits and properties of foreign countries. It can therefore be taken as true that our exports are paid for by imports, and that when we limit our imports we limit our exports and our national commerce under a law as fixed as the law of gravitation.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire made a single defense with regard to these schedules which I desire to answer, and it is the only defense, outside of that of the chairman, so far as I have observed in the RECORD, that I regard as meeting the matter in any degree, and that is the statement, in effect, that by lowering these schedules we would invite into this country the imports of other countries, which would throw out of employment our own laborers.

This theory, Mr. President, is not sustained by the theory of economic teaching which shows that inevitably exports are always paid for by imports and imports are paid for by exports. If we examine into the individual transactions of which the aggregate is composed, we will observe that when any American ships abroad any export, whether it be cotton or cotton goods of any kind, he is immediately paid in cash or cash credits or its equivalent, and therefore there comes back to the United States the immediate equivalent of that which the American exports. That individual export is instantly balanced. Since the whole must be composed of its several parts, it follows that exports are paid for by imports and imports are paid for by exports, and when we reduce the tariff and invite into our country foreign exports in effect we stimulate American industries; we enlarge the productive power of the American factory; we increase the demand for labor and the employment of capital; and we put ourselves in the attitude of shipping abroad more things than we now ship and enlarging both our exports and imports in like volume. I think the reason why our imports and our exports compare so unfavorably with the other nations of the earth is largely because we have followed the Chinese method of excluding, in large measure, the products of other lands.

I wish to call attention to our status as to imports and exports per capita.

COMPARISON OF THE COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES AND OTHER COUNTRIES.

We plume ourselves on our tremendous commerce in exports and imports when, in point of fact, our rank among other nations of the world in the quantity of our foreign commerce per capita is entirely discreditable to us. In the quantity of our exports and imports we rank far inferior to every highly civilized country in Europe, as the following table will exhibit, taken from the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1907, page 738:

Imports and exports per capita of countries, 1906.

Country.	Imports.	Exports.
United States	17.30	22.10
Argentina	34.87	54.87
New Zealand	70.23	85.70
Australia	53.77	79.70
Belgium	93.00	75.30
Canada	45.08	39.84
Costa Rica	22.53	25.25
Chile	21.25	26.89
Cuba	62.31	66.06
Denmark	64.82	55.55
France	25.86	24.77
German Empire	28.05	22.56
Netherlands	184.36	143.01
Norway	36.22	21.91
Sweden	29.23	22.93
Switzerland	81.97	59.97
United Kingdom	68.45	42.49
Uruguay	21.13	38.34

The imports of the German Empire, of France, United Kingdom of the Netherlands, of Norway and Sweden, of Switzerland, exceed their exports by hundreds of millions, but the exports of Siam, Egypt, Peru, British Indies, Haiti, Cuba, Mexico, Russia, Santo Domingo, and the Congo have their exports exceeding their imports, and we are not in a good class if civilization and intelligence are considered.

We are in the activity of our foreign commerce, however, decidedly ahead of the Congo Free State, Persia, Peru, Paraguay, India, Siam, and Turkey. Our country can feel but little pride in the school of political economy, if organized blind greed can be called a school of political economy, controlling the United States and its pitiful comparison with the foreign output of the other intelligent nations of the world. Let us at least equal Great Britain, which has learned the economic truth that prohibitive tariffs obstruct and do not promote commerce, and let us act upon that policy, retaining our tariff for revenue, high enough for honest incidental protection and no higher.

Our patriotic citizenship has been grossly misled by the leaders of the party in power as to our comparative commercial activities.

The growth of our exports and imports show a small relative increase:

Our total imports:
1881	$650,000,000
1890	773,000,000
1900	830,000,000
1907	1,415,000,000
Our total exports:
1881	883,000,000
1890	845,000,000
1900	1,370,000,000
1907	1,853,000,000
Population in—
1881	58,000,000
1890	62,000,000
1900	75,000,000
1907 (estimated)	88,000,000

It will be seen from these tables that notwithstanding the tremendous improvement in modern machinery and the increased output from that source, and the wonderful growth of seagoing vessels and their freight-carrying capacity, our exports and imports have about doubled in 26 years and have not increased much faster than our population. This is a discreditable showing to the intelligence of the American people.

It will thus be seen, Mr. President, that our exports and imports are small compared to the exports and imports of nations whom we have been taught to believe inferior to us; but in the building of a nation we are ourselves vast consumers of our own products, and this must stand to our credit.

It will also be seen that our exports and imports have not grown in the last quarter of a century much more rapidly than our population, which shows in fact that we have not kept pace in foreign exports with the enormous productive capacity of modern machinery and invention.

These are facts worthy of consideration, which tend to show the natural consequences of obstructing our imports by prohibitive taxes, by vexatious and difficult regulations; and the present bill is peculiarly unwise because instead of providing a substantial reduction on the prohibitive tariff rates and removing the obstructions to our commerce it has utterly failed to do so. On the contrary, it has increased many items and the average of all items, and the crowning absurdity is offered in proposing to penalize foreign countries, who are already largely excluded from our markets, by threatening them with a 25 per cent advance on rates now largely prohibitive unless they promptly remove within the year the tariff obstructions which are obnoxious to us, and thus we invite the retaliation of the nations of all the world. Nations are composed of individuals, and the law of human nature which governs the individual will govern nations to a substantial degree.

OUR NATIONAL PROSPERITY IS NOT DUE TO A PROHIBITIVE TARIFF, BUT IN SPITE OF IT.

Mr. President, it has been a common practice for the advocates of the high tariff to claim that the prosperity of the people of the United States and the employment of its people is due to the so-called "protective tariff"; nothing could be more utterly fallacious.

Modern prosperity is due to the dissemination of human knowledge through the printing press, inventions of labor-saving machinery, hundreds of thousands of inventions under the reward of personal patents granted by the United States, granted by Great Britain, by Germany, by France, by Norway and Sweden, by Italy, by Japan, by every civilized country in the world.

The United States has granted over 900,000 different patents covering art in manufacture, but the art to which we are chiefly indebted for our modern prosperity is the development of paper making and the printing presses, by which the learning and the knowledge of all men is made the common property of every man and enriched him beyond all computation.

Out of these inventions have sprung the incredibly cheap manufacture of cloth and fabrics of every description; of metals in a multitude of forms, from Bessemer steel to the Waterbury watch, made by machinery and distributed to man at an incredibly cheap price. The telegraph, the telephone, the modern railway, the mail service, and every agency of civilization have been brought into service by the wonderful increase of the intelligence of man. China has just completed its first railway built by Chinese engineers and workmen and soon will be the joint heir of the wonderful increase in human knowledge.

All of the nations of the world prosper in this magnificent development of the human race, due to the increased intelligence of man, due to modern processes, springing chiefly, and above all, from the great invention of Gutenberg.

Mr. President, not long since I stood upon the banks of the Niagara River. Down the canal below the great falls I saw a great wood yard, and saw two men passing pieces of wood to an endless belt. I followed it down the bluff nearly 200 feet; below a giant penstock of 7 feet in diameter delivered a column of water upon a turbine wheel developing over 1,000 horsepower, which caused to spin with lightning speed French burr wheels, against which these pieces of wood were placed and pressed by hydraulic pressure.

They melted almost instantly, and the macerated fiber by an endless belt, passing immediately into the paper factory on top of the bluff, was automatically delivered into a circular vat with moving arms; adjacent was a man engaged in putting into this vat sizing; the prepared mixture was fed upon an endless belt, porous—the water dripped through, the sheet of wet paper emerged, passing through a series of rolls, the last ones heated by steam, and at the end of the comparatively small room the material which a few minutes before had been logs of wood appeared as rolls of news paper ready for the Hoe press.

At Herald Square, New York, I saw these same rolls being fed like lightning into giant printing presses and emerging a modern newspaper, a miracle of design; hundreds of thousands of copies turned out in a few short hours, full of learning, literature, art, full of business, full of wit and humor, full of the news of the whole world gathered together by the ablest men with the aid of the telephone and telegraph; filled with beautiful illustrations and photographs of everything conceivable.

Mr. President, where is the advocate of the prohibitive tariff so lacking in common sense or intellectual integrity that he will assert that these great advances of the human race, which are common to all the civilized nations, whether they have or whether they have not a protective tariff, nevertheless enjoy all of these things. Let those who believe that these things are due to the protective tariff support this bill and applaud it. But those that see that these things are due to the development of the human race and to the providence of God can be misled by no such shallow sophistry.

Mr. President, England has been very prosperous; she is the mistress of the seas; the sun never sets upon her dominions; her wealth is enormous. The prosperity of England is not due to the protective tariff, but to the policy of the greatest freedom of international commerce.

France and Germany have the protective tariff and are likewise prosperous, but they are prosperous in spite of the protective tariff and not because of it. The prosperity of the whole world is due to the increasing intelligence of the human race, its mastery over the forces of nature, its substitution of machinery for the labor of man.

"Protectionists justly contend that the high tariff of 1897 has not ruined the foreign trade of the United States, which on both its import and export sides has exhibited a great advance." Undoubtedly this contention is true, but the obstructions interposed in commerce has not served to make the imports and exports of the United States contrast favorably with the exports and imports of other nations. The imports and exports of the United States do not compare favorably with those of the civilized nations of the world, as I have already shown.

One thing should be settled for all time, and that is such prosperity as we have can not be due to the artificial obstruction of our international commerce.

HOW THE PRESENT SYSTEM WAS ESTABLISHED.

It would seem incredible that the monopoly engendering policy could be established and persisted in against the will of the people, and I shall endeavor to show how this has occurred and its proper remedy.

In 1856 both parties were agreed on a low revenue-producing tariff. For 15 years everybody had been content with the low

Walker tariff of 1846. The exigency of the civil war required a high tariff for the extra revenues demanded at that time.

Like all tariffs this Morrill tariff of 1861 raised the prices on the consumer and gave the American manufacturer a special opportunity to make money at the expense of the consumer.

When the war was over the question of lowering the tariff began to be considered.

The Protective Tariff League was thereupon organized, with far-reaching affiliations, powerful press agencies, with an educational bureau which instructed every boy who approached the voting age throughout the United States in the sophistry of a high tariff, appealing to his patriotism to stand by American labor. This policy has had abundant success, but it could not have succeeded except for the political changes in party administration which had taken place prior to the war.

This change to which I refer was the transfer of the power directly from the people through the agencies of precinct conventions, nominating delegates to county conventions, county conventions composed of delegated delegates to select delegates for the State convention, State conventions composed of delegates delegated by delegated delegates.

These political functionaries were thrice removed from the people, the State delegates being delegated by county delegates, the county delegates being delegated by precinct delegates, and the precinct delegates probably delegated by the local representatives of what is known as the "machine politician" and his petty circle.

In machine politics the precinct manager will call a primary at some place convenient for his control and probably inconvenient for the attendance of the people. He will notify his strikers in advance and be sure of a sufficient number to put through a slate and plan agreed upon. In this manner the machine can evade a wholesome public opinion and manipulate the delegates to the county convention, and with this machine county convention a machine State convention is assured.

In this manner any person having an important material interest to serve, such as establishing or maintaining a policy of government, permitting some people to tax other people for their benefit, have a political opportunity.

All that the Protective Tariff League and its commercial and political allies had to do under this system of government was to have a proper bureau established, see to it that representatives of the system were in place to manage the machine politics; and in this way they have been able to control nominating conventions—county, State, and national—and the will of the great body of the people could not make itself freely felt, being unorganized and not clearly realizing the manner in which the monopoly producing system was taxing them.

The Protective Tariff League and the representatives of selfish commercial interests, the beneficiaries of the manipulations of our statutes, have intertwined and interwoven themselves with the organization of the Republican Party in such a manner as to be inextricable. They have successfully appealed to the well-known patriotism of the great body of Republican citizens and skillfully trained them to believe as true, things which were not true in fact, and were sophistical in reason and unsound in conclusion. This process has gone on until it has become impossible to separate the political and patriotic impulse from the commercial, so that men of high character and upright purposes find themselves used against their will and are more often used in total unconsciousness of the fact that they are being used by commercial interests under the color of patriotism and party pride. The machine method of politics is a bad method and ought to be abated.

BOTH PARTIES HAVE BEEN AFFECTED BY THIS EVIL.

It is this method which sometimes sends to the Senate of the United States representatives who would not be the choice of the people at a popular election.

It is natural therefore that the election of Senators by direct vote, or the nomination of Senators by direct vote should not be approved by those who have been or might expect to be indebted to machine politics hereafter for their own preferment.

It was a recognition of this abuse, which has grown up in our country, that led the Democratic Party at Denver, which, I freely confess, is not entirely purged of this evil of machine politics, to put the query to the people of the United States, Shall the people rule?

The true remedy for this condition is not by an inconsequential debate with the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who has spent months and years over these schedules without ever touching the only question of importance, to wit, the difference in the cost of the production at home and abroad, but it is to be found by reducing the political machine to innocuous desuetude and the restoration of the people's rules by the direct primary, allowing each citizen, regardless of party, to nominate and elect his representative in county, State, and Nation, and to establish an "initiative and referendum," with its salutary check on the representatives of the people.

Machine politics glorifies organization and forgets that the best safeguard of society is to allow the actual sentiment of the majority of the people having appreciable education to rule and not take that power out of their hands by clever machine manipulation.

When we follow delegation of power from the citizen to the primary delegate, from the primary delegate to the county delegate, from the county delegate to the nominee for the legislature, from the member of the legislature to the United States Senate, a Senator chosen in this manner is four degrees removed from the people.

Through machine politics selfish interests can exercise an undue influence in our parties and in our administration of government. I can not but feel that the influences of monopoly in this country are in present control; that this bill is written to serve their purposes; to make the rich richer and the poor poorer; to benefit the few at the expense of the many.

In making this comment I do so with the profound conviction that this condition can not be greatly prolonged, but that the American people will in a short time cause the laws to be so amended as to promote the greatest of all modern needs—the more equitable distribution of the proceeds of human labor.

> Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate longer. I have taken some pains to show that in the protected industries the labor of the country is not paid as well as in the unprotected industries; that labor has continued to receive a diminishing part of the proceeds of labor; that labor has not received a fair share of its own product. I have undertaken to show how labor was naturally oppressed by the upbuilding of gigantic monopolies in this country, whose policy was to close up factories, to pay labor as small a wage as possible, to raise prices, and to limit the output; to tax the people as high as they thought the "traffic would bear," and to control their wage-earners, both commercially and politically. That is a very natural thing for them to do. They are not greatly to blame if the law permit. The lawmaker is greatly to blame if the law continues to permit.

But I have also demonstrated that our census shows, in the most overwhelming and convincing manner, that this bill has paid no attention whatever to "the difference in cost of production at home and abroad;" that that difference, even if the foreign manufacturer paid nothing whatever for his labor, could not exceed nineteen and a fraction per cent for pure protective purposes, while many of the rates in this bill exceed 100 per cent. Having shown this, having pointed out what the effect has been upon the wages and general conditions of labor and upon the mortality of human life under this system of government which we have been following; having submitted the suggestions for the amendment of these conditions, in the hope that perhaps in the future they may be of some use to future students of these questions, I am done.

I have called attention to the policy of New Zealand, which protects human life first, which has controlled monopoly, in order that the poorer and the weaker elements of society may have a better opportunity to live. I have called attention to what the necessary result is of gigantic fortunes piling up until the fortune of a single individual will reach nearly a thousand millions; that its only effect upon this country must be to absorb all of the transportation and transmission companies, all the coal mines, all of the purchasable lumber and ores, all of the purchasable real estate, all of the things visible and invisible desired by men and generally grouped together and called the "opportunities of life."

There can be but one result, and the Senate is in honor bound to consider this and to find a way to control it and correct it, in order to protect the children and the women, as well as the men of this country.

I can do nothing more than appeal to the Senate and to call their attention to their responsibility in this matter. Having done so, I have discharged the only duty which it is possible for me to discharge. I have given many days of hard labor to this question, and of unremitting industry, in a desire to place upon this record the truth, and nothing but the truth, in the hope that it might appeal to the leaders of the Senate, and, if it did not, that it might appeal to the people of the United States.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter the inviting field of political discussion which has been so eloquently invaded during the last two or three days. I am not going to call attention to the fact that our Democratic friends denounced so vigorously the extravagant appropriations made by the Republican Party and then proceeded to appropriate $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 more for the normal expenses of the Government than was appropriated by the Republicans during any year of their administration. I am not going to discuss the merits or the demerits of the principle of free trade, which has been so earnestly advocated by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], or the policy of protection, which has been so ably presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I am not going to call attention to the probabilities of the tremendous commercial conflict with which we are going to be confronted in a very short time, and the fact that our Democratic friends are making no preparation to enable us to meet that situation upon anything like equal terms with our opponents. I am not going to engage in a criticism or denunciation of this bill at this time. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, I am going to commend one feature of this bill, and commend the majority side for inserting it in the measure, and I am going to take the time of the Senate briefly to present and place in the RECORD some facts which I think justify the action of the committee, in the hope that they may be of some service possibly when the bill gets into conference.

I am glad that the Senate of the United States, at any rate, proposes in some way to stand by the rights of the United States and to assert the rights of the United States and attempt to protect the interests of the people of the United States and of the Government itself, and I hope that other branches of the administration will feel encouraged by the independent action of the Senate to stand a little bit more firmly hereafter for American rights and American interests; and I hope that another body, to which I can not refer here, will see the justice and the merit and the patriotism of the action of the Senate committee and will confirm the action of the Senate in inserting a certain provision in this bill. The section to which I refer is section 103, on page 144, and reads as follows:

SEC. 103. That from and after 90 days after the passage of this act no fresh or frozen halibut or salmon from the North Pacific Ocean or its tributary waters shall be admitted into the United States through any foreign country, except when the same shall be in bond from an American port.

Mr. President, that is a very simple provision. It appears to be a very innocent one, and yet it means a great deal to one of the very rapidly developing industries of this country. It means a great deal to American citizens who have invested their capital in a certain industry, and I want to call attention to the difficulties that are thrown in the way of American enterprise and American capital and American energy in developing the industry that is affected by this provision. I want to present the facts justifying the insertion of the provision in this bill.

Mr. President, "but if any provide not for his own, especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel."

Great Britain acts on this theory. She promotes and protects first the interests of her own people at all times. Our Government seems to act upon the opposite principle. We promote and regard the interests of others above those of our own. The methods of both countries are nowhere more clearly shown than in connection with the halibut industry.

Prior to 1915 nearly all of the halibut supply for the East was obtained through Alaskan ports and Seattle. The halibut banks lie largely about 700 miles north of Seattle and extend for 1,500 miles along the Alaskan coast but outside of the 3-mile limit. They are thought to be the most extensive halibut banks in the world. About 100 vessels were engaged in the industry, employing over 2,000 sailors and fishermen and bringing in a catch of over 60,000,000 pounds of the value in their raw state of over $3,000,000. The larger part of this output was shipped to American markets in the East.

The magnitude of the industry on the Pacific coast, as compared with the Atlantic, is shown by the following figures from the United States Bureau of Fisheries: Four millions two hundred and eighty-nine thousand nine hundred and fifty-two pounds of halibut were landed at New England ports during the year 1915, while over 60,000,000 pounds were landed in Pacific ports. Ninety-five per cent of the halibut supply to the people of the United States comes from the Pacific coast.

This is an industry worth encouraging. It means for the American ports of Seattle and Alaska the employment of thousands of men, the investment of millions of dollars, the establishment of large packing plants, the building up of a local fleet, and the training of a large number of seamen. Whatever can be done in a reasonable way to encourage the employment of citizens, the training of American seamen, the use of American capital, the building of American homes, and the keeping at home of the purchase money for the fish which largely supply our home market should be done.

What is Great Britain doing to get this great industry, and what are we doing to retain it? The methods pursued by the two Governments strikingly illustrate the policy pursued by each toward its citizens and their interests.

Early in 1915 the Grand Trunk Pacific Railroad was completed to Prince Rupert. It was largely financed by the Canadian Government, which laid out the town site of Prince Rupert at the terminus of the railroad. Prince Rupert is about 600 miles north of Seattle and within 32 miles of the Alaskan coast. It is 600 miles nearer the halibut grounds than Seattle, lying directly on the line between Seattle and the Alaskan ports and fishing banks. The shipment of from forty to sixty millions of pounds of halibut to the eastern market is an important item of freight to the Grand Trunk Railroad, the greater part of it taking express rates as perishable cargo and paying five times the rate charged upon ordinary merchandise. The Canadian authorities saw this at once and with characteristic energy and methods proceeded to get it. They saw that if they could induce the fishing fleet to locate at Prince Rupert, make its headquarters there, and unload its catch there they would get the benefit accruing from it. They would get the benefit not only of the freight charges but also very largely the value of the catch. Prince Rupert had the natural advantage of being 600 miles nearer the fishing grounds with rail connections to the eastern market. Special efforts were made and special inducements offered, customs regulations were waived, and import duties on gasoline and distillate used on American ships were rebated. In December, 1914, the Canadian Government passed an order in council permitting the minister of customs to make such regulations and conditions as he found necessary to induce foreign corporations and American vessels to bring their business to Canadian ports. This order in council provided that during the year 1915 foreigners and foreign corporations bringing fresh fish in vessels registered in the United States could land such fish at any Canadian port without the payment of duty and transship the same in bond to any port in the United States. This order in council also provided that foreigners and foreign corporations bringing fish into Canada would be permitted to purchase supplies at any port in British Columbia; all of these things to be done, however, under such regulations and conditions as the minister of customs should determine.

A cash subsidy of $80,000 was given by the Canadian Government to the Canada Fish & Cold Storage Co. This company actively engaged in the halibut industry, sent its vessels to the Alaskan banks, and shipped its fish by rail from Prince Rupert to the eastern markets. Under a subsequent order in council, which I shall later refer to, the Canada Fish & Cold Storage Co. was enabled to furnish special facilities, inducements, and encouragement for the purchase and shipment in bond of American-caught fish to American ports.

Under these conditions the halibut industry was rapidly diverted to Canadian ports, especially Prince Rupert. Many of the Seattle firms were compelled to open offices at Prince Rupert. Alaskan plants were shut down and much of their business transferred to Prince Rupert. Over 28,000,000 pounds of the halibut trade in the nine months of the year 1915 were diverted to Prince Rupert and other Canadian ports, and under subsequent orders in council it is estimated that for the year 1916 from forty to fifty million pounds of halibut will be handled at Prince Rupert. During the month of February, 1916, out of a total catch of 3,013,545, 2,520,895 pounds were discharged at Canadian ports, leaving only 960,650 pounds at all American ports combined. If nothing is done by our Government, this entire industry will very soon be transferred to Canada and largely centered at Prince Rupert. This will be accomplished very largely through plain, palpable, and rank discrimination against our citizens and apparently without any protest on our part and without any serious attempt to meet such discriminations, unless, Mr. President, we are able to secure the passage of legislation along the lines of the amendment inserted in this bill by the committee.

Under our laws Canadian ships can land their cargoes of fresh halibut at any port. The fish is admitted free of duty and can be sold for consumption locally or sent to any market in the country.

How are our people treated in Canada? An order in council was enacted under date of December 10, 1914, under which American ships bringing fresh fish into any of the ports of Canada could land them without the payment of duty and transship them in bond to any port in the United States. Under this order in council, however, no fish could be sold in Canadian markets for local consumption. The fish could be sent directly from the vessel to any port in the United States, but had to be shipped in bond. Under this order the vessels whose cargoes did not make up a carload could not very well avail themselves of the privilege of shipping in bond; and the result of that was that a good many of the smaller vessels with the smaller catch did not land their catch in Canada, but took it to some ports in the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator whether it is not a fact that under the regulations of the Canadian Government American fish shipped from Prince Rupert must be shipped without any sorting?

Mr. JONES. I shall come to that just a little later.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, I knew the Senator was familiar with it, but I did not know whether or not he had spoken of it in my absence.

Mr. JONES. I shall come to that a little later.

In order to meet some of these conditions and further encourage the bringing of American fish into Canada, another order in council, under date of March 9, 1915, was passed.

Mr. President, it is very interesting, when we consider how we legislate here, to consider the facility and expedition with which they enact legislation up in Canada. Apparently, whenever they see something wrong, in order to correct it they pass an order in council. I am going to quote one of these orders in council in a moment, and it will give us some light—and from a very interesting viewpoint, I think—as to how they legislate.

I call special attention to the reasons for this order, as set out in the preamble, and the results to be accomplished. The order with the preamble, or whereases, is as follows:

P. C. 468. Privy Council, Canada. At the Government House at Ottawa, Tuesday, the 9th day of March, 1915.

Present: His Royal Highness the Governor General in council.

Whereas by order in council, dated 10th December, 1914, it is provided that for a period of 12 months, from the 1st of January, 1915, foreigners or foreign corporations bringing fresh fish in vessels registered in the United States of America to any port in British Columbia shall be permitted to land such fresh fish at any such port without payment of duties, and transship the same in bond to any port in the United States (without the right, however, to sell in Canada any of such fresh fish so landed), and foreigners and foreign corporations bringing fresh fish in vessels so registered in the United States of America to any port in British Columbia shall be permitted to purchase supplies at any port in the said Province of British Columbia, the whole under such regulations and conditions as the minister of customs shall determine.

It will be noted, Mr. President, that this is what we might term an amendment of the order in council of December 10, 1914, which was issued for the purpose of covering the year 1915. In March, 1915, they find that order in council of 1914 does not exactly meet the situation, and so they promptly get together, and on March 9, 1915, they issue this order in council which I am now reading to meet special conditions that they did not anticipate in the order in council of December, 1914.

And whereas the said privileges are restricted to foreigners and foreign corporations bringing fish in vessels registered in the United States of America and shipping such fish in bond direct from the vessels.

Now, this is one of the matters that they want to correct:

And whereas this prevents smaller vessels or boats, the catches of which will not make up a carload, or the owners or operators of which may not be in a position to themselves ship their fish to the eastern United States markets, from availing themselves of the privileges.

That is one of the situations that they want to meet by this new order in council; and here is another:

And whereas the minister of the naval service is informed that, in view of the fact that Prince Rupert is several hundred miles nearer the fishing grounds than is Seattle, and as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is now operating, so that fish can as readily be shipped to the eastern United States markets from Prince Rupert as from Seattle, if such boats and smaller vessels were permitted to go to Prince Rupert and sell their catches to some person or corporation which would in turn ship them in bond to the United States, and if such vessels or boats were then permitted to purchase supplies for their fishing operations, a considerable number of them would transfer their base of operations from Seattle to Prince Rupert—

Note this, Mr. President:

and would probably later transfer their vessels or boats to the Canadian registry and permanently operate from Prince Rupert.

That is one of the special things to be accomplished by this new order in council which we should consider. They hope by this new order in council not only to get these small boats to bring their catches of fish to Prince Rupert, but they hope eventually to have the American registry of these vessels given up, and that they will take Canadian registry.

And whereas the bonding and outfitting privileges have been renewed to vessels shipping their own catches direct, and it is deemed advisable that such privileges should for this year be available to smaller vessels and boats, therefore His Royal Highness the Governor General in council is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered as follows.

That is a very effective method of legislation, and it is a very expeditious method of legislation, too.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. May I ask whether that is done without any order of the Canadian Parliament?

Mr. JONES. There is no record of any other proceeding than this. The Governor General apparently has authority to do these things.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am very much interested in this. I was appealed to some months ago or thereabouts by a gentleman representing the fishery interests with reference to the very matter about which the Senator is now talking.

Mr. JONES. The Governor General, apparently—I have not looked into the details of their form of government—has some legislative power vested in him with reference to matters of this kind, and he seems to use it to the advantage of the English people and the Canadians.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. He uses it to our disadvantage.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; he is not looking after our interests at all. That is up to us, and that is what I am glad to say the committee is trying to do by this proposition here. I am glad to find something in a Democratic measure that I can commend, and I commend this very heartily.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator need not limit himself to this. He will find much in it that he will commend.

Mr. JONES. I hope so.

The said order in council of December 10, 1914, is hereby amended to provide that—

"During the present calendar year (1915) foreigners or foreign corporations bringing fresh fish in vessels registered in the United States of America to any port in British Columbia shall be permitted to land such fresh fish at such port without payment of duties and transship the same in bond to any port in the United States—

Now, here is the change that is made in the order of December, 1914—

or to sell such fish in bond to such local dealer or dealers as may be properly and duly licensed therefor, under the regulations and conditions thereinafter mentioned, which dealer or dealers shall export the same in compliance with the bonding requirement (without the right, however, in either instance, to sell in Canada for consumption therein, or otherwise except in bond, any of such fresh fish so landed); and such foreigners and foreign corporations bringing fresh fish in vessels registered in the United States of America to any port in British Columbia shall be permitted to purchase supplies and ship crews for such vessels at any port in the said Province of British Columbia—

But note they keep control over the purchase of these supplies and the shipment of crews. Our vessels are not permitted perfect liberty in the purchase of supplies up there, or in the securing of crews.

the whole under such regulations and conditions as the minister of customs may determine."

RODOLPHE BOURDEAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

I shall call attention a little bit later to some of the regulations that are imposed upon these vessels with reference to the purchase of supplies or the shipment of crews.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the point suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] a while ago with reference to the sorting of fish; and the difficulty under which they operate grows out of this situation:

The cargoes of fish fresh from the fishing grounds are composed of fish of various sizes. These are graded, some being suitable for the eastern market and some not. As I understand, the eastern market wants halibut of a certain size. That size is classed as No. 1, and in order to get the best prices and to command the best market the fish, of course, need to be graded so as to be sent of the character and quality desired.

Under the foregoing order in council an American vessel had the opportunity to grade its fish and sort them at the Canadian port, and those suitable for the eastern market could be disposed of for shipment to the eastern market, and those not suitable for transcontinental shipment could be boxed, packed, and shipped by boat to Seattle and other western markets, provided, of course, always that they were shipped in bond. The small vessel with the small catch could come into Prince Rupert and sell its catch to local dealers, who, however, were under bond to ship them on to some American port. They could not be used for local consumption.

After the fishing boats became accustomed to going to Canadian ports and the industry was being generally diverted to these ports and business connections established the Canadian Government deemed it fitting to make a further order in council with the specific purpose of centering this industry at Prince Rupert and in Canadian vessels. Again I call attention to the facility with which they make legislative enactments to meet special conditions and to overcome special difficulties or accomplish definite purposes. Another order in council was passed prohibiting absolutely the shipment of any American cargoes out of Canada in any way except by rail.

The following is taken from the United States Consular Reports, dated at Prince Rupert, British Columbia, June 9, 1916:

The minister of customs of the Dominion of Canada has made a regulation under authority given him by the Dominion order in council of March 9, 1915.

I referred to this a moment ago as another order in council. It apparently is not exactly an order in council, but it is a regulation which the minister of customs was authorized to make under the 1915 order. It amounts to the same thing as a new order in council, amending the former one:

This order in council permitted American fishing vessels to sell their catches in the ports of British Columbia, but the same must be shipped in bond to the United States, and it authorized the minister of customs to make regulations for its carrying out.

The present regulation is to the effect that fish sold by American vessels in British Columbia ports must be shipped to the United States by rail only and may not be sent by steamship to American ports.

This not only stops all shipments by water but it prevented sorting and grading, as none could be shipped to the Pacific coast ports because there is no rail connection. Thus, the entire cargo had to be shipped by rail to the Eastern States. This placed a most serious handicap on American firms and vessels, and, in fact, placed a valuation on fish caught by Canadian vessels of from 25 to 33⅓ per cent above that paid for fish caught by Americans. The Canadian could sell his fish for consumption in Canada. He could send them to the Pacific coast markets and also to the East. In other words, he had three clear markets for his fish, while the American vessel was compelled to ship its fish ungraded and unsorted only to the Eastern States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was stated to the committee that by authority either of an order in council or by some action of the department—I do not now recall which—there was an absolute prohibition against the sale of fish caught by American fishermen at any point in Canada.

Mr. JONES. For local consumption.

Mr. SIMMONS. For local consumption.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes. I have read that in the order in council here.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not present when the Senator did so.

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is specifically mentioned in the order in council which I have read.

Mr. President, by a recent order issued at Ottawa an American in need of ice, bait, or other supplies can not get the same unless the master declares that he will return to a Canadian port with his catch of fish in order to ship the same by rail to American markets. I think I have here a copy of that order, which I desire to read. I sometimes wish that we had a system of legislation like they have up in Canada, and that we would put it in operation.

This order reads as follows:

During the present calendar year (1916) foreigners or foreign corporations bringing fresh fish in vessels registered in the United States to any port in British Columbia shall be permited to land such fresh fish at such port without the payment of duties, and transship the same in bond to any port in the United States, or to sell such fish in bond to such local dealer or dealers as may be properly and duly licensed therefor under the regulations and conditions hereinafter mentioned, which dealer or dealers shall export the same in compliance with the bonding requirements, but without the right, however—

This is what the Senator from North Carolina called attention to; it is reinserted in the order in council in 1916—but without the right, however, in either instance, to sell in Canada for consumption therein or otherwise, except in bond, any of such fresh fish so landed; and such foreigners and foreign corporations bringing fresh fish in vessels registered in the United States of America to any port in the said Province of British Columbia, shall be permitted to purchase bait and supplies, and ship crews for such vessels at any port in the said Province of British Columbia: Provided—

Now note, Mr. President, the condition imposed by this legislation upon shippers desiring to purchase supplies or ship through:

Provided, also, That such foreigners and foreign corporations, before bringing fresh fish to a port in British Columbia, may be permitted to purchase bait at any port in said Province of British Columbia upon an undertaking to the satisfaction of the minister of customs that catches of fish made with any baiting so supplied shall be landed at any port on the mainland of British Columbia, and be thence forwarded in bond to a port in the United States, the whole under such regulations and conditions as the minister of customs may determine.

It also appears that when an American vessel has discharged her fish at a Canadian port and may be inclined to go to an American port for supplies it is hinted to her master that relations will be more cordial and it will be to his interest to invest his money and buy his supplies at a Canadian port.

I have here a letter from a fish dealer in Seattle under date of August 4, 1916, in which he says:

Just this week fishing vessels have arrived that have taken bait and ice in British Columbia but did not go back there with their catch, and they have been blacklisted and denied the privilege of again entering a British port and discharge cargo, and one of them, calling again for bait at a Canadian port, the Canadian dealer refused to supply him with any, having been listed as one of the undesirable by this Government that is working so hard to benefit the American fishermen.

That last sentence is put in there in that way because it has been suggested that the Canadian officials claim that they have established at Vancouver facilities in the interests of American fishermen rather than in their own interests. That explains the last sentence I have read.

So, Mr. President, under this last order an American ship going up there and getting supplies will be at once blacklisted unless it brings its catches back into Canadian ports.

Contrast the treatment accorded Americans by Canada with the treatment accorded Canadians by this country. Note the disadvantages of the one and the advantages of the other under the latest regulations. American fish can not be sold in Canada for home consumption. Canadian fish can be sold in Canada for home consumption and may be taken to and sold in any American port free of duty. American fish can be transshipped from a Canadian port only in bond to an American market and only by rail.

A vessel coming in from sea with a load of fish should grade, sort, and size them, as no market seems capable of handling all grades to the best advantage. Under Canadian regulations, however, the American catch must be placed in cars without grading or sorting and shipped by the only rail route leading across the continent, and the entire catch, good or bad, large or small, dumped in our eastern markets ungraded. The Canadian vessel, which has caught its fish on the Alaskan banks, alongside the American vessel, reaches port at the same time with American fish. She can grade her fish and sort them, send what she desires to the American eastern markets, sell some for home consumption, and bring the remainder to our Pacific coast markets.

An American firm buying halibut for the western and Pacific coast markets can not buy American fish, but must buy fish from the Canadian ships. The Canadian firm can buy Canadian fish for any market and can buy such American fish as it desires for the eastern American market.

The situation is well described in a letter from the National Independent Fisheries Co., of Seattle, as follows:

No doubt you are also aware that a few months ago they made a new interpretation of an order passed in council something like a year or two ago this being that no American fish can be shipped from a Canadian port to an American port unless it is shipped via rail. There is absolutely no way in the world that we can ship via rail from Prince Rupert to Seattle and do it in such a manner that the fish would arrive in usable condition. Neither is there any reason why, after a law is in operation for a year, that they should find a new interpretation which will operate directly and only against the American interests in Prince Rupert. At present two-thirds of the halibut industry is being carried on at Prince Rupert. In other words, the United States fishing industry on the Pacific coast is a thing of the past, at least the halibut part of it is, and now that they have a few American companies located at Prince Rupert they are proceeding to drive them out because they have fulfilled their purpose, the initial purpose being that if American companies would come to Prince Rupert naturally the American boats would follow. They now have the American boats, so they are proceeding to drive out the American companies, and they will soon buy fish at their own price. In fact, practically all of the halibut that is brought into Prince Rupert is bought at a margin of from 1 cent to 5 cents per pound less than what we are paying for the same fish at Seattle.

It will do no good to put a small duty on fish shipped from Canada to the United States, because a number of years ago, when there was a duty of 1 cent per pound, the Canadian Pacific Railway rebated this amount to the shipper. If at any time a duty on fish is to be enacted, it should be made high enough to make it impossible for the Canadian railways to rebate the duty.

We can also say that the Canadian people claim that shipping the fish from Prince Rupert means cheaper fish for the public. We can positively show by present statistics that prices on halibut since the opening of the Grand Trunk road from Prince Rupert have been higher than ever before in Boston, New York, Chicago, Buffalo, and in fact all the Middle West and East.

The Booth Fisheries Co., of Seattle, says:

I understand the Canadian Government or its representatives claim that they are not trying in any way to injure the halibut business or fishing industry of the United States, but they are simply trying to encourage Americans to come into Prince Rupert and do business; but they do not explain to you that when they get us there we are entirely in their hands.

I understand that the only rail connection with Prince Rupert is to the eastern points. The only other place in Canada where there is rail connection is down at Vancouver, and under this order in council that prohibits the shipment except by rail into the United States, fish that are brought into Prince Rupert that are not desirable to ship into the eastern market must be taken by boat from Prince Rupert to another Canadian port where there is rail connection. The only one is Vancouver. So they have to take them there by boat and then transship them by rail. For a while they could not do that. The Canadian Pacific raised some objection because they were not able to take any of those fish to the eastern market. So by a regulation right off the trigger they amended the order in council or construed it by a new regulation, so that they could ship out of Vancouver.

Now, you can readily see what effect this would have on fresh fish.

This last arrangement, Mr. President, occurred before the latest regulation or order in council. They have modified the order so as to assist the Canadian Pacific Railway Co.

In reference to the effect of this regulation in regard to fishermen, I desire to read an extract from a very comprehensive statement prepared by the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle that came to hand after I had prepared the other. The writer says:

At the present, American fishermen may accompany American vessels to Canada and temporarily are accorded permission to reship on other American vessels in Canada. They must not, however, under restrictions imposed by order in council, go from Puget Sound to British Columbia for the purpose of joining an American vessel there, and any shortage which occurs in an American fishing crew in Canada entails filling the vacancy with a Canadian fisherman, unless there is an American fisherman available who has been discharged in Canada from some other vessel. The objections interposed to the coming into Canada of Americans of the working classes has even been applied to prevent American houses from sending bookkeepers from Puget Sound to handle accounts at the Prince Rupert branches.

Yet they say they are doing all this in the interest of America; that they are not discriminating against us; and if we try to protect ourselves they threaten us with retaliation, as I shall show a little later on.

The result of all these regulations, discriminations, and special inducements is to center at Prince Rupert the halibut industry of the Pacific coast, through which the almost entire supply of the eastern market comes. The American fishing fleet has been drawn to Canadian ports and the benefits from this important industry are being transferred to Canada. American ships are giving up American registry and are registering in Canada, just as they hoped to accomplish, as expressed in one of the whereases in the order in council which I read. Sailors and fishermen are transferring their homes from the United States to Canada. The United States is, in fact, furnishing a great resource for Canada. It is also supplying the market for Canada and it is also paying to Canada American money for a real American product. American money is being largely disbursed at a Canadian port, and largely remains there for an American product to supply an American market.

What are we doing to remedy this? Prior to this amendment here we have been doing nothing. Apparently we have not even protested against these unfair and unjust discriminations. Two years ago the serious effect which the opening of a new Canadian port with rail connections would have upon our Pacific shipping and commercial interests was called to the attention of the Government. Nothing was done. Eighteen months ago a delegation of some of the best business men from Washington and Alaska came here for the purpose of securing regulations or legislation which would prevent the anticipated effect. Nothing was accomplished, and the committee went home completely discouraged. The administration would not consider at all suggestions of a tariff to meet the situation.

I want to say, Mr. President, that the Secretary of Commerce gave the other committee every consideration and did everything in his power to secure or to find some method to meet the situation there and to meet this discrimination. We have had his hearty cooperation at all times in trying to work out a solution of this matter. The department has submitted a report on the condition and has taken a strong stand in favor of the amendment which was incorporated in a bill introduced in the House of Representatives.

This bill as introduced would meet the situation fully and fairly. It would place American fish in American markets on an equal footing with Canadian fish. It would not, of course, do away with the prohibition against the sale of American fish for consumption in Canadian markets, but it would place the Canadians upon an equality with the Americans in the American markets. It would encourage American capital, American fishermen, and American industry in American ports. American fishermen would take their fish into American ports, where they could be met with ferries connecting with the Grand Trunk Railroad, if it was necessary to have the fish shipped over the Grand Trunk Railroad. In fact, all that the Grand Trunk Railroad would have to do would be to establish a regular ferry service between some Alaskan port to which the American fishing fleet would bring its cargoes. This would also be less expensive to American ships than to have to go to Prince Rupert. This bill—now incorporated as an amendment to this bill—seems to meet with the hearty approval of the Department of Commerce. It very strongly urged its passage. The bill was being favorably considered by the Ways and Means Committee of the House and there was every prospect that it would be favorably reported. The Canadian Government heard of the measure. It acted promptly in the interests of its people and industry, and on July 12 the Department of State received an informal and confidential communication from the British ambassador stating that the Canadian Government had requested him to say that the passage of H. R. 15839 might affect the friendly relations of the two countries.

Canada and Great Britain are very prompt to act locally in the interest of their own people and they are also very prompt to act in their dealings with other Governments in the interest of their own people, and, as I said, immediately upon the reading of this bill they got busy. I have here a letter from the State Department, under the date of July 31, which I will read. I asked for information with reference to this matter. I had heard that the Canadian Government had protested against this legislation, and I asked the State Department for the facts, and this is what the department writes:

On July 12 the department received an informal and confidential communication from the British ambassador stating that the Canadian Government had requested him to say that the passage of House bill 15839 would affect the relations of the two countries and might cause the Canadian Government to enact retaliatory legislation.

There were no further details in the letter. The bill in the House was held up on this information being conveyed to it; no report could be secured. Apparently we could not legislate in our own interests without the consent of Great Britain. They could continue to discriminate against us. We could not legislate for fear of additional retaliation on their part.

I am glad that the Senate committee did not yield to such a protest. I am glad that the committee have inserted a provision in this bill to meet our own needs and our own conditions and our own situation, and that they are not deterred from taking this action by the fear that Great Britain or Canada may retaliate if we enact this legislation.

Mr. President, is it conceivable that in the face of regulations such as I have read here, in the fact of discriminations plain and palpable against our citizens, Canada or Great Britain would really have the effrontery to suggest to us that if we enact this legislation they would retaliate?

Mr. THOMAS. I think I am authorized to say that no such intimation was made to the committee at any time during the consideration of the amendment. Of course it would have reported the amendment in any event.

Mr. JONES. What is proposed is a small piece of legislation; but without it we surrender the fisheries of our North Pacific coast to the British Empire. We have no industry more important to the development of our northern coast, and, above all, we should encourage and hold under our flag the seafaring class of citizenship, and this bill will do it. It does not interfere with Canadian vessels in our markets or theirs. It simply brings the fish caught for our markets directly to our ports, and from there in bond, if they take a Canadian route across the continent.

What will the Senate do in the matter? Will we submit supinely to the declaration of Great Britain in a matter affecting vitally the interests of our people and refrain from doing what we have a perfect right to do and what any self-respecting, independent Government would do in behalf of its citizens, capital, and industry?

In conclusion, Mr. President, I want to read the last paragraph of a protest prepared by the Seattle Chamber of Commerce, which very clearly and concisely summarizes the whole situation:

What would be the inevitable result of further permitting present conditions?

They ask this question, and then they answer:

No. 1. A purely American industry would be permanently diverted from American to Canadian ports.

No. 2. The $5,000,000 capital investment of American citizens would become valueless and be absorbed by Canada.

No. 3. The fishing fleet, numbering hundreds of vessels, would pass from American to Canadian registry.

No. 4. Thousands of American fishermen would eventually be displaced by Canadian subjects.

No. 5. American transportation companies—water and rail—would be robbed of the transportation of fish caught on our own coasts destined to American markets.

No. 6. American commerce would lose the trade benefits incidental to operation of this $5,000,000 industry, yet in its infancy.

No. 7. The control of a valuable American food supply and of its cost to American consumers would pass from the United States to Canada.

The judgment of a Solomon is not a requisite to a just determination of the question. Shall we rob Americans of the results of their enterprising industry at the instance and for the benefit of Canada, or shall we conserve American interests regardless of Canadian protests, confident in the knowledge that our act of self-preservation imposes no unfair competition on like interests of Canada? There can be but one answer. Self-preservation is the first law. If we destroy ourselves, we must gain but the contempt of other nations, who attribute our concessions to inefficiency or fear.

To acquiesce in the protest by Great Britain in the face of the evidence is to shame the spirit of '76 and to humbly and submissively extend our wrists to be manacled as evidence of our commercial and industrial vassalage. We therefore voice our protest on behalf of American institutions and ask the small protection for our industry and our employees that would be afforded—

By this amendment.

Mr. President, as I said before, I am very glad indeed to see that the committee has put this amendment on the bill. I heartily commend it, and I trust that not only will the Senate accept it, but that when the matter goes to conference there will be no question about it being accepted and made a part of our law in the interest of our own people and of our own industries.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, with the advent of another Democratic administration of the affairs of this Government, history, following the inevitable rule that like causes will always produce like results under like conditions, has recorded again its usual verdict, "Treasury deficit." This verdict is no surprise to those who have studied the application of Democratic policies to the fiscal affairs of this country for years. Every line of the past history of that party may well be written in that single word "deficit," and every prophecy of its future expressed in the same word.

That party came into power on March 4, 1913. It enacted its new tariff law October 3 of the same year. That law had not been enacted six months before it foreshadowed the usual deficit, that the ordinary revenues of the Government would not meet the ordinary expenses of government. Worse than that, Mr. President, it showed that even the extraordinary taxes levied under that law would not meet the operating expenses of government.

Notwithstanding the fact that the new administration, after collecting revenues through tariff and ordinary internal-tax methods, reached the hand of direct taxation into the pockets of the American people and drew from them an extra $30,813,640 from income during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and another $47,283,714, corporation tax for the same year, or a total of $78,097,354, it was compelled to admit, even with that addition to the Treasury, that it was still $100,000,000 short, and a new revenue bill was introduced in Congress on September 21, 1914, to meet that shortage.

This country, then at peace and at a time when world conditions were specially favorable to us, was forced to levy an additional and burdensome war tax on its people. With an ever-increasing importation of foreign goods, due to our tariff act of 1913, displacing our own products in our own markets, thereby diminishing the consumption of those products in that market, and depriving our farmers and our manufacturers and our laborers of their legitimate profits in producing them, we were compelled to add further to their discomfort by devising new methods of taxation to separate them from their earnings.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, in addition to our customs duties and our ordinary internal revenues, the present administration collected in round numbers $52,000,000 from its war-revenue measure and about eighty million from income taxes, or $132,000,000 in extraordinary taxes. And yet, Mr. President, notwithstanding that additional draft on our people, our expenses exceeded our income that year by $57,442,509. During that year we had not added to our Army or our Navy program. There was not one extra dollar for preparedness.

Excuses were made that the war in Europe had so checked importations that the customs duties would fall below the Treasury estimates. The administration attempted to excuse its maladjustment of customs duties on that ground. But, Mr. President, that claim is more than refuted. It is confounded by the actual facts. For notwithstanding this great war which did check the importations of some commodities of manufacture, the first two years of the operation of this revenue law show imports nearly equal to the imports under the last year of the Republican tariff law, and the year 1916 shows the greatest importation ever recorded in our history. Still our income therefrom is going ever lower and lower, as our markets are being supplanted more and more by this unscientific, un-American tariff bill.

Let the following table of imports and revenues which I shall ask to insert in my remarks speak not only the gradual surrender of our markets to the foreigner but also the gradual decrease in the revenues heretofore charged to the foreigner for the privilege of sharing our better markets. I ask unanimous consent that the table referred to be inserted at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

	Amount.	Revenues collected.	Per cent collected.	Loss.
Imports 1912, Republican law.	$1,818,000,000	$326,340,000	18	.....
Imports 1913, 9 months Republican, 3 months Democratic	1,792,250,000	310,800,000	17.4	.....
Imports 1914, Democratic 5 months; war	1,789,250,000	241,250,000	13.5	$85,090,000
Imports 1915, Democratic, all war year	1,778,600,000	198,606,000	11.1	127,634,000
Imports 1916, Democratic, all war year	2,197,883,000	211,866,000	9.72	114,474,000

Mr. McCUMBER. You will observe, Mr. President, by this table that instead of the importations being checked by this war, the year ending June 30, 1916, shows an increase of $379,800,000 over the year ending June 30, 1912, and $405,630,000 over the year ending June 30, 1913. When I refer to any year I am speaking of the fiscal year ending June 30.

Glancing at the revenue column of this table we will find that on our importations for 1912, under a Republican tariff, we collected $326,340,000. In the year 1914, nine months of which were under the Democratic tariff law, with an importation of nearly the same amount, we collected only $241,250,000, or a loss of $85,000,000. For the year 1915, with nearly the same volume of importations, our receipts were only $198,606,000, or a loss of $127,730,000; and for the year 1916, with an importation of goods nearly half a billion dollars more than in the year 1912, we collected in revenue only $211,866,000, or $114,470,000 less than we collected in 1912. Had we retained the average Republican duty on the importations of 1916, our revenue therefrom would have been $395,619,000, instead of $211,866,000, the amount collected, or a saving of $183,753,000.

Running through the column showing the percentage which the collection of revenue bears to the imports, we find for the year 1912, under the Republican tariff law, we collected 18 per cent; in 1913, nine months Republican administration, 17.4; in 1914, under the Democratic tariff law, 13.5; in 1915, under the Democratic tariff law, 11.1; and in 1916, under the Democratic tariff law, 9.72. It will be observed, therefore, that in the three years of the operation of the Democratic tariff law the percentage of collections to the amount of our importations fell from 18 to 9.72 per cent.

As the importations go up and displace our own products—and, therefore, ought to put a greater amount into the Treasury—both the average rate of duties paid and the amount collected go down. If that is not frenzied finance, I do not know the proper name to apply to it.

Mr. President, since the present administration came into power it has spent most of its time in searching for additional sources of taxation, scanning every field of production to find some business or some property upon which it could levy a tax.

In the law of 1913 additional tolls were exacted from manufacturers of and dealers in tobacco. An increased tax was laid on wines and liquors. You then levied a toll upon every banker and broker. You taxed theaters, circuses, shows, and pool halls. You then hunted up the commission merchants and taxed them. Then you made every man who gave a note, a bond, a deed, or a power of attorney pay heavy tribute to your demands. You made every man who took out an insurance policy, who made a bill of sale or a bill of lading, answer to your demand for cash. You held up every man who bought a ship ticket, every man who sent a telegram or a telephone message. You levied a tax on every man who entered a sleeping car or a parlor car. You charged a tax to every woman who bought a bottle of perfume or a toilet article of any character. Still the leakage is greater than the supply.

Now comes the demand for a still greater increase in our taxes, a deeper plunge into the pockets of the taxpayers. But here you dare not load that tax burden directly on all the people. You are fearful that it will be resented by an army of voters at the November election, and so you seek to so adjust it that the number who suffer will be comparatively few, ignoring the juster rule that in times of peace each person should share in the support of his Government in proportion to his means, and that only in times of war or great distress is the Government justified in confiscating the fortunes of the individual to subserve the interests of the Nation.

Mr. President, the $130,000,000 which we are called upon to raise to defray the expenses of defending our border is the price we are paying for our first experience in attempting to dictate to an independent country who should and who should not be a candidate for office in that country. It is the penalty which we are called upon to pay for the attempted conversion of the right of the Executive of this country to refuse to recognize the head of another Government into the right to persecute, drive into exile, and hound to death the head of another Government. It is the penalty we pay for invading that country, killing its citizens in furtherance of a set purpose to destroy an individual citizen of that country. It is the harvest of hatred which we are reaping through our arrogant demands and unwarranted war upon President Huerta.

And, Mr. President, $130,000,000 is but the beginning. It covers the expenses, not for the fiscal year, but only up to December 1, a little more than two months, and it is admitted that another $80,000,000 will be needed if the defense of our border is continued.

However, this excessive taxation is not to pay this $130,000,000. That sum is to be met by a bond issue, whose principal and interest are to be taken care of by the next Republican administration. Neither is the ship-purchase bill, involving $50,000,000, included in the extra expense for which we are exacting further taxes from the public. Neither is the nitrate plant, involving another $20,000,000, included in these extra expenses. All these are to be met by a bond issue, to be shouldered onto the next administration. Two hundred millions is to be met by such bond issue in addition to the amount that must be raised by taxation.

What, then, are the extraordinary expenses that must be cared for by a further levy of exorbitant war taxes? Preparedness! That is, preparedness in addition to the usual charges incident to the normal development of our Army and Navy and fortifications. The appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 for this purpose must be regarded as the normal expenditure. That appropriation totaled $257,696,277. The appropriation for the same war purposes for the fiscal year 1917 totals $606,664,675. The preparedness increase, therefore, amounts to a difference of $348,968,398.

It is admitted that the deficiency bills will carry from $40,000,000 to $42,000,000 additional for preparedness, making a total of about $390,000,000 that may be properly charged to the additional preparedness program.

But your appropriation bills for 1917, including deficiency appropriation bills, will carry more than $1,630,000,000. The appropriations for 1916 were a little less than $1,115,000,000. The appropriations for 1917 therefore exceed those of 1916 by $515,000,000.

The preparedness is but $390,000,000, leaving an excess of other expenditures of $225,000,000. That sum represents the extraordinary and ever-increasing extravagances of this administration, in the face of an ever-diminishing income, demanding an ever-increasing tax burden and bonded indebtedness to meet it.

I ask leave to insert here a table showing the several items of the 1916 and 1917 appropriation bills for more detailed comparison.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

Increase 1917 over 1916, $515,446,670.62.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, these increasing extravagances and growing deficits become the more glaring and inexcusable when we remember that without any of these war tax levies, previous Republican administrations, through the ordinary channels of Federal tax levies, and with very little interference with those subjects of taxation left to the State for the conduct of State and municipal affairs, expended for the Panama Canal more than $300,000,000, carried to a successful issue the war with Spain and maintained armies in the Philippines at a cost estimated more than a billion dollars, paid principal and interest on all bonds issued therefor, met the demands of pension legislation when it was at its highest point in our history, and issued bonds only to cover a small portion of the expenses of the Panama Canal of about $134,000,000, and turned over to Democracy, March 4, 1913, a well-filled treasury.

Our appropriation bills show that in 1911 we appropriated $87,855,000 for the Panama Canal; in 1912, the last year of Republican administration of the affairs of the country, $45,560,000. Your 1916 appropriation for the Panama Canal was but $16,940,000 as against the Republican appropriation for 1911 of $87,855,000, or a saving of $70,915,000, or, as compared with our 1912 expense, a saving of $28,620,000.

The last year of the Republican administration we appropriated for pensions for the year ending June 30, 1913, $165,000,000. Your 1917 appropriation bill calls for $158,000,000. On that you have been relieved of $7,000,000.

Notwithstanding that you have been relieved of these heavy expenses which Republican administrations met out of the ordinary revenues; notwithstanding the fact that by invading the tax domains of the State, you collected for the year 1916 by new tax levies, over and above the 1915 tax levies on incomes an increase of $44,735,000, on ordinary revenues an increase of $52,306,000, or a total increase of $97,000,000, still you are demanding that the jackscrew of taxation shall be applied with mightier power to squeeze out additional dollars to meet your extravagant appropriations.

And outside of these additional expenses for preparedness, what great benefit is the country to receive? Your only unanswerable answer is that you have made positions for about 30,000 deserving Democrats. You have created that many new offices. You have established an additional annual charge of $40,000,000 to pay their salaries. I am forced to admit the truth of that answer. You were office hungry when you came into control. Your generals, your colonels, your captains, your corporals had received no compensation for their fidelity for 16 years. Your first impulse in assuming the reins of government was to open the Treasury vault that your army might be fed.

No sooner were the heads of some of the departments settled in their positions than a systematic assault on all Republican officeholders, that must have been premeditated, was inaugurated. Charges of the most frivolous character were immediately made against every postmaster in my State in charge of an important office who had more than a year to serve, and telegrams were sent to them asking for their immediate resignations. The mails were too slow for your purpose. The same process was inaugurated with reference to land offices and other Federal positions in the State. There has not been a piece of what you call constructive legislation that the merits of the bill have not been subordinated to the demand for official places. Constructive legislation, like the rural-credits bill, has been made top-heavy, complex, expensive, and absolutely worthless that a few positions might be secured.

Mr. President, since this administration came into power all industrial progress has been checked. There have been no new lines of railway. The rolling stock of the railway companies of the country has not been even kept up to the standard. No new factories, no new lines of business, have been established, except to supply the demand of the European war. We propose now to increase our bond issue $130,000,000 for defense against Mexico, $50,000,000 for the ship-purchase bill, $20,000,000 for a nitrate plant—$200,000,000. I do not criticize bond issues by a Democratic administration. I believe such issues represent the normal workings of that party when in control of the Government. The only fault I find is that, instead of levying excessive taxes to cover the country's losses due to their maladministration, those losses should be measured by a bond issue. If the Democratic Party would only fund its deficit and the sums of money raised by additional taxes, war taxes, and so forth, into a bond issue, the total would always be the measure of Democratic inefficiency more easily understood by the public. It would be a clear and simple way of striking a balance between the policies of the two great parties touching revenue and expenses. If we should fund into a bond issue the losses of the people due to such administration, it would amount to billions yearly.

Mr. President, the American people have never been so successful, have never been so free from burdensome taxes, as when such taxes have been levied on imports and the usual internal-revenue tax. Those simple methods have furnished sufficient revenue for all ordinary purposes of government. Whenever a Democratic administration has had control of the country, it has adopted a tariff schedule which has checked our industries, surrendered our markets, and vastly diminished our receipts from customs. So, too, whenever that party has obtained control it has increased our expenses without in the slightest degree reducing the cost of living or in any way benefiting the public. Therefore I am in favor of issuing Government bonds rather than submitting the people to further extortionate taxation. The issue of bonds would serve three purposes: First, it would give proof of Democratic inefficiency and stand as a danger signal to the public; second, it would save the people from the double and treble taxation necessary to meet our losses; third, it could be met and taken care of by the next incoming Republican administration through the proper adjustment of customs duties in conjunction with the usual internal revenues.

Mr. President, we ought not to have any Federal income tax in times of peace. We ought not to levy any of the added taxes mentioned in this revenue bill in time of peace. This bill invades the recognized exclusive rights of the States. We are living in a most progressive age. The people of our cities as well as of the country are demanding greater and ever greater conveniences and higher and ever higher standards of living. To meet these demands every town and city and State is adding enormously to its tax burden. The State can not levy taxes upon imports. It must seek its revenue by direct taxation, by taxes on incomes, on inheritances. It must secure its funds from licenses on divers lines of business. The policy of the Government, which represents the people of every State, ought to refrain as much as possible from invading these fields of State revenue. We ought not to duplicate State taxation. We ought not to double taxation. We ought to be able to meet the expenses of this Government by customs duties supplemented by the internal revenue derived from the liquor and tobacco stamp tax; and, Mr. President, we could meet them by a proper adjustment of such customs and internal revenues.

Mr. President, few people realize to what extent the present industrial welfare of this country is dependent upon the European war and the crash that will inevitably follow the moment peace is declared unless we return to our protective policy. So long as we can feed, munition, and clothe their armies our agricultural and manufacturing welfare is secure. The moment that war demand ceases every industry based on that demand will come toppling to the earth.

Mr. President, the increase in our exports due to war demands amounts to at least $2,000,000,000. It follows that the close of this war will entirely eliminate that much of our export business, which alone has sustained this Government since the advent of the new administration. When Europe turns its present army of destroyers and consumers into producers, with all their energies accentuated to make good their losses and all their habits schooled by necessity to the most rigid economy in consumption, her people will purchase from us less than before the war.

Mr. President, the year ending June 30, 1914, just before the conflagration of war burst forth in Europe, was a normal export year in the United States. In order to determine just what influence this war has exerted on our industrial destiny, just to what extent it has saved us from an industrial catastrophe, I have prepared a table covering 36 items of export products which feed, arm, munition, clothe, and keep an army, showing the exports of those articles during the normal year of 1914 and the year 1916.

I ask permission, Mr. President, to have inserted this table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Exports of domestic merchandise used as war materials for fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, before the war, and for the corresponding period ending June 30, 1916, showing normal exports in 1914 and increases due to war for 1916, which will drop to normal when war is ended.

Exports of domestic merchandise used as war materials, etc.—Continued.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like Senators to listen to just a few of these changes and note to what an extent we are dependent upon this European war for our prosperity.

In the year 1914 we exported $3,000,000 worth of horses; in the year 1916, $73,000,000 worth, an increase of 2,060 per cent.

We exported of mules in the year 1914, $690,000 worth; in 1916, $22,000,000 worth, or an increase of 3,320 per cent.

In brass and manufactures of brass we exported in 1914 $7,000,000 worth; in 1916, $164,000,000 worth, or 2,100 per cent increase.

We exported in aeroplanes in 1914, $226,000 worth; in 1916, $7,000,000 worth, an increase of 3,090 per cent.

We exported in 1914 of automobiles and parts $33,000,000 worth; in 1916, $120,000,000 worth, or 260 per cent increase.

We exported of sulphuric acid in 1914 $125,000 worth; in 1916, nearly $2,000,000 worth, or 1,500 per cent increase.

Of other acids we exported $357,000 worth in 1914 and $22,000,000 worth in 1916, or 6,200 per cent increase.

Of explosives we exported in 1914 $6,000,000 worth; in 1916, $460,000,000 worth, or 7,400 per cent increase.

Our horseshoes increased 2,070 per cent, our barbed wire 490 per cent, our manufactures of iron and steel 660 per cent, and so on through this list of 36 articles.

The total increase on these 36 articles alone, due to war demands, is $1,740,271,978. Were we to include the hundreds of less important items called for by this war, our increase would be more than $2,000,000,000.

What will be the effect on our prosperity when this demand ceases? Hundreds of thousands of laborers will be thrown out of employment. Our markets will be flooded with the agricultural and manufactured products of the world. What, then, is our imperative duty to-day?

Mr. President, our paramount duty is to put ourselves in readiness to meet that condition. Our duty is industrial preparedness. How may we meet that duty? By a patriotic policy which shall assure the American market to the American producer; by a policy that will shield that market against foreign invasion so long as its demands can be supplied by our own citizens for a fair and reasonable compensation; by the reinstatement of our Republican policy of protection; by a return to a wise and economic administration of the affairs of the Government; by relieving our people from these excessive, annoying, unjust, unequal, and iniquitous systems of taxation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the relative merits of the policies of protection, a tariff for revenue only, or free trade, but to discuss some of the features of this bill and its effect upon the great constituency which in part I represent, and also the theory and practice of taxation which the bill exhibits.

I assume, Mr. President, that no one enjoys paying taxes. It is one of the necessary evils, however, which nearly every citizen is confronted with from time to time to a greater or less degree, made necessary by reason of the fact that Governments must be supported for the protection of society from the evils which grow up within and might destroy it, and from evils or dangers which may arise outside of a society or a nation like the United States and threaten its existence.

The average man understands perfectly well that taxation is necessary, and he is willing to pay it with a reasonable degree of cheerfulness if he is under the distinct impression that he is getting a dollar's worth of service for the dollar which he contributes to the support of the Government, and also if he is under the impression that he is not taxed unjustly or out of proportion to his wealth or his ability to pay in comparison with his neighbor.

I assume it must be granted that the success of tax measures should be measured very largely by the ability of the legislative body to so impose taxes as to conform with those principles of fair play which every citizen, as a taxpayer, desires to see enforced.

To my mind, Mr. President, this bill, prepared in the conference of the Democratic Members of this body, and I assume representing the last and therefore the best thought of the Democratic Party, should be considered as the beginning of a new theory and practice of taxation in the United States so far as taxes levied by the Federal Government are concerned.

It has been repeated so often that I hesitate to repeat again, but, nevertheless, I shall to this extent, that up to this time, or up to the period of a year or two or three years ago, the Federal Government has been in a large measure dependent for its revenues upon the moneys collected at the customhouse and upon two or three forms of what might be termed direct taxation—taxes upon tobacco and taxes upon liquor—which taken together with the taxes upon imports have been relied upon to support the Federal Government. That theory and practice of taxation has existed, Mr. President, and has been accepted by the American people for a great number of years. I think it can not be denied that the people of the United States have never indicated by their votes or otherwise their desire to have that system changed to the extent that the chief burden of taxation should be borne by the citizens or any portion of the citizens of the United States in the form of a direct payment into the Treasury.

I think it can not be denied that the people have never registered their verdict upon the proposal of the Democratic majority that hereafter the Federal Government shall not rely upon indirect methods of taxation, but that in future it must rely and should rely upon the taxation of citizens directly. Apparently, however, the party in power is determined through its policy, a tariff for revenue only, which failed unfortunately to produce the revenue in a sufficient amount to meet the running expenses of the Government, from this time forth if it remains in power to raise the great bulk of Federal funds by direct taxes and to raise only incidental funds, if I may use that descriptive term, from indirect taxes.

So this bill, which, I take it, is the first serious effort of the Democracy to change the theory and practice of our Federal taxation system, should hold a peculiar significance to the people of this country. For one I doubt very much whether the great public of the United States realizes the fundamental change in our theory of taxation as represented by the presentation of this bill and the avowed purpose of the Democracy to pass it and place it upon the statute books.

Mr. President, each and every State in this Union is almost entirely dependent upon direct taxes for the support of its own government and for the government of its counties and its municipalities. For the United States to commence upon a large scale, as this bill proposes, to duplicate, as it were, the direct taxes imposed upon the citizens within the States is a matter which should receive the careful consideration of every taxpaying citizen, and the careful consideration not only of this body and the House of Representatives but of every State legislature in the Union.

If once the Federal Government has embarked upon the imposition of direct taxes without limit there of course can be no prophesying as to the extent to which the Federal Government may or can go.

The duplication of taxes upon citizens within the State is not the only disturbing element in this new theory and practice, but there is another disturbing element in the fact that by reason of the necessity of selecting different industries or forms of business upon which to impose taxes the Congress of the United States may be tempted to indulge in grave injustice. I take it that we are human, that we are entirely willing, most of us, as representatives of constituencies great or small, if we have regard for our political future, and some of us have, to be able to go back to our constituents and say that by our votes they have not been subjected to any very heavy Federal taxation. I take it that as this theory and practice of direct taxation is enlarged and extended and as more resources must be developed for Federal taxation as the years go by, and therefore more industries selected upon which to impose taxes and more forms of business searched out upon which to impose the burden, we will have a repetition in the Congress of the United States of the raising of local issues, the voicing of local needs, and protests with which we are already so familiar in some of the great appropriation bills, and to which state of affairs there has been directed very severe criticism in recent years, and to which there has been given a definition, namely, "pork-barrel" legislation.

The gentlemen on this side of the Chamber have not been permitted to have anything to do with the writing of this measure. While it was being hammered together behind the doors of the Democratic conference only rumors of what was going on reached our ears. But to my mind some very significant rumors came floating through the cracks of that door, and they were to the effect that various Senators on the Democratic side, while the different forms of business and different industries were being selected by the Democratic conference to bear the burdens of taxation, protested in that conference on the ground that their political future in their home States would be jeopardized if such and such an industry were taxed.

Mr. President, I do not at this time direct any criticism at a Senator who thinks best to bring to bear that kind of argument when the matter of Federal taxes is under discussion and is being decided by a party conference. I do not take this opportunity to criticize the raising of local issues and injecting into such a discussion the political fortunes of individuals. But I do assert, Mr. President, that a bill such as this—and any other bill that is to follow in the Congresses to come, written along the lines of direct taxation imposed upon specially selected industries—will inevitably lead to that spirit of localization; will inevitably lead to a consideration on the part of individual Senators of their own political fortunes, and as a result these annual taxation measures, changing as I assume they will have to change from year to year in rates and amounts, if this theory is to continue under a continuance of power on the part of the Democratic Party—I assume that from year to year we will find the Congress of the United States legislating on the great matter of taxation in the "pork-barrel" spirit, precisely as the river and harbor bill is framed in regard to some of the States of the Union.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I was very much interested in the statement which the Senator has just made, to the effect that he had heard that objections were made to sundry provisions of the bill because it might affect the political fortunes of certain Senators. Without discussing that question or what may or may not have been said, if it be a fault, did not the Senator himself here a short time ago object to the income tax because an undue proportion of it would bear upon the citizens of his own State?

If the Senators to whom the distinguished Senator from New York is now referring were guilty of anything improper, would not the same criticism lie against the Senator's argument when he was speaking against the proportion of the income tax which would be borne by his fellow citizens in his own State?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I would seek, in answer to the question of the Senator from Ohio, to divide my answer into two phases. In the first place, when I criticized, not the theory or the principle of the income tax, but the specific provisions of the present tax, I did it in the open, upon the floor of the Senate. Secondly, when I did protest in my humble way against the disproportionate amounts which some of the people of the State of New York are compelled to pay for the support of the Federal Government, I uttered that protest in the interest of justice in the matter of taxation. It is not confined to the State of New York; it extends to many other States.

I did it in connection, as I remember, with the so-called good-roads bill, which was to appropriate $85,000,000 out of the Federal Treasury to embark the Federal Government upon the building of good roads, and I called attention to the fact that the citizens of New York, acting on their own initiative and with their own spirit of enterprise, by heavily taxing themselves, infinitely more heavily than the citizens of many another State in the Union, had built and completed their own roads without any help, without ever thinking of coming to the Federal Government to ask for help. In that connection I called attention to the fact that the Federal taxes were now so contrived as not to tax the people whom I in part represent in proportion to their wealth, but only to tax a certain class of wealth and spend the proceeds of those taxes a thousand miles away from where the tax was collected. That was my purpose in protesting against the income tax as it is now upon the statute books.

However, Mr. President, I do not think it can be successfully denied that if this theory of direct taxation is to be perpetuated by either political party the action of future Congresses will be replete with efforts on the part of Members of the House and Members of the Senate to so contrive those taxes as to fall least heavily upon their own districts.

To my mind, the inherent danger to the spirit of our democracy is the fact that the Federal Government proposes to support itself in the future by selecting certain industries to pay the taxes; sitting here in Washington, we are to reach out when we spy upon the horizon some fortunately prosperous industry, and select it to bear the burden, and to select none others. To my mind, Mr. President, it is undemocratic, it is unjust, it is absolutely unscientific in its method of imposing taxation. It will tend to debauch the public spirit of the United States and rob great masses of people of that sense of responsibility which they should have in the support of the Government that protects them.

It is apparent, and it has been apparent for some time, that the gentlemen who have been writing this bill have been groping for some industry or set of industries upon which to lay the heavy hand of taxation. It is quite evident that they have disagreed on many of the particulars. They have even disagreed with the occupant of the White House. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has already called attention to the utter abandonment of every proposal that Mr. Wilson has made with respect to the industries or occupations or businesses to be taxed. They have even abandoned his proposal that the income tax should be modified with respect to the taxable incomes.

I have here, Mr. President, a copy of the address of the President of the United States which was delivered to Congress on December 7, 1915. I well know, of course, that he has been quoted upon this floor more often than has any other writer in human history; and yet, I make so bold as to call the attention of the Senate to what the President said on this very matter, and to indicate, at least, that the majority side have very little confidence in his suggestions and judgment as to the industries or kinds of business which should be selected to bear the burden of Federal taxation. The President said:

> To what sources, then, shall we turn? This is so peculiarly a question which the gentlemen of the House of Representatives are expected under the Constitution to propose an answer to that you will hardly expect me to do more than discuss it in very general terms. We should be following an almost universal example of modern governments if we were to draw the greater part or even the whole of the revenues we need from the income taxes. By somewhat lowering the present limits of exemption and the figure at which the surtax shall begin to be imposed, and by increasing, step by step throughout the present graduation, the surtax itself, the income taxes as at present apportioned would yield sums sufficient to balance the books of the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year 1917.

And yet the responsible leadership in the Democratic Party in the Senate has absolutely declined to follow that suggestion. Likewise, his suggestions for taxing gasoline, automobiles, and iron and steel products. All have been abandoned, apparently, as unworthy of consideration.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from New York has just stated that the message of the President from which he has read was delivered on the 7th of last December. I want to know if he meant to convey that this was the suggestion of the Presidential mind in August, 1916?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not a mind reader. The present occupant of the White House has reserved the human right to change his mind so many times, or to permit others to change it for him, or to permit his friends to disagree with him and apparently to override his suggestions, that I confess myself powerless to diagnose the state of mind of the President of the United States with respect to taxation any more than I am able to diagnose it with respect to the Mexican problem.

We heard coming through the crack of that door that a subcommittee of the Finance Committee of the Senate, composed entirely of Democrats, had made up its mind at one time in the course of the proceedings to reduce the taxable incomes in the individual income tax law to $2,000; that would have been in line with one of the President's suggestions; but I apprehend that they thought better of it, not because it was an unjust proposal—for it can not be considered unjust—not because it would fail to bring in revenue, but because upon the eve of a presidential campaign it would tax too many people, and so the President's own suggestion was thrown by the board in that respect.

It is entirely true that the surtax figures were crowded down and the rate of the surtax increased, but that did not tax any additional voters. The Democratic Party, of course has no hesitancy in raising the taxes upon those who already bear a large share of the burden.

I am not myself sorry for the man with an enormous income who is to be taxed under the provisions of this new law, but I am sorry for the effect it is going to have, if continued and emphasized, upon the spirit of our democracy, for it is class legislation. It is not an injury to the class that bears the burden so much as it is an injury to the great mass of people who are being taught to understand and believe that they can get something for nothing, and that they shall not be called upon to bear even a proportionate share of the burdens of taxation.

Mr. President, I think any student of ancient history will recall that when the democracy of Rome reached that stage of evolution when the party in power distributed corn in the forum and taught the people of Rome to believe and to insist later that they should bear none of the burdens of supporting the Government, but rather that they should be fed by the Government, then the Roman democracy started on its decline; the spirit of the Roman people was poisoned; and I for one, Mr. President, dread the growth, even in a minute degree, of any such spirit as that in this great democracy of ours.

Mr. President, coming to two or three of the details of this bill, may I suggest, in no spirit of captious criticism, that there are features in it that are exceedingly crude and which indicate that it was hammered together at the last moment in a desperate effort to pass it at this session in time for its proponents and defenders to take the stump in the presidential campaign?

Referring again to the income tax, somewhat ahead of my discussion, I have stated my belief that the normal taxable income should be reduced in order that a greater number of the people should gain and hold a sense of responsibility toward their Government. But may I also call attention to the fact, Mr. President, that the income-tax law which is now upon the statute books—and this bill makes no change in this respect—perpetrates, in my judgment, a very severe injustice; this phase of the matter I hope some day will be taken into serious consideration by the Congress. In our income-tax law we make no distinction as to the character of incomes which individuals obtain from their work or from their investments. The English income-tax law, it seems to me, is much wiser in this respect, for, as I understand it, they classify the income which an Englishman receives into earned and unearned incomes, and they are taxed at different rates—the unearned income, if my recollection is correct, being taxed at a higher rate than the earned income.

What does that mean? Take a young man who graduates from a law school. He has had to study mighty hard. Probably he has gone through the high school and through college and then entered a law school. He or his family have gone to great expense in procuring for him that education. At the age of 25 or 30 he "hangs out his shingle" and waits for clients. If he is fortunate, he begins to get some clients before he is 35. He knows no limitation as to the hours of his labor; he studies and toils and works to his capacity whenever he can find any work to do, and, through the exercise of tireless industry and the application of intelligence in his profession, he finally, perhaps at the age of 40, attains an income, we will say, of $10,000 a year.

The Government steps in and taxes him upon that income at the rate of 2 per cent, after subtracting $3,000. He pays on $7,000, roughly speaking, at the rate of 2 per cent, that being the normal tax. Contrast that man who has hammered and worked his way to a position where he has become useful to his community and has accumulated something by his own earning capacity, with the man who sits and clips coupons, bringing him in $10,000, but who never does a stroke of work to get that $10,000. The worker is taxed just as much as the drone.

If we understood a little better the refinements of taxation, I think we would make a distinction in the United States between the earned and the unearned income. It may be that had not our friends upon the other side of the aisle been in such a hurry to hammer this remarkable bill together, they would have given some consideration to those phases of the income tax which perpetrate injustice upon many deserving people and constitute a discouragement to thrift, enterprise, and industry, and an indirect encouragement to those who have inherited incomes and who do nothing more than to cash the dividend checks.

Mr. President, there is one phase of this bill which, to my mind, is exceedingly important, for it is new, so far as I know, as a matter of Federal taxation. I refer to the inheritance tax. Reverting once again to the responsibility which every citizen owes in the support of his Government and the danger of teaching people to abandon that sense of responsibility by imposing taxes on a small class of people and relieving the great number from the burden, I simply desire to say that, entirely outside of the merits of the inheritance tax, I, for one, very, very much regret the $50,000 exemption. That is along the same line as the exemption under the income-tax law. No State in this Union would think of setting up such a high exemption as that; and, Mr. President, I doubt if either political party would think of placing such a high exemption in the inheritance tax if the presidential campaign were not about to start.

Let us consider the effect of the proposed inheritance tax upon the State which I have the honor to represent in part. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has already called attention to the fact that nearly all of the States have relied to a very considerable extent upon inheritance taxes to aid them in support of their respective governments. I think it fair to say that no State has placed as great a reliance upon inheritance taxes as has the State of New York. For many years the State has imposed such a tax. The rates and conditions of collection of the tax have changed from time to time, but through a series of years we have derived sufficient experience, Mr. President, so that I feel no uncertainty as to the truth of the assertion when I say that the State of New York has at last settled upon an inheritance tax which bids fair to be permanent, or reasonably permanent, in its rates, unless disturbance occurs from without.

Again, the State of New York has had more regard for the refinements of taxation. New York classifies estates into three classes before it seeks to impose a tax upon them. For instance, a direct descendant, such as a son or a daughter, does not have to pay, in the State of New York, as high a rate upon the estate that he or she inherits as a cousin or a nephew or an aunt. Then, too, persons inheriting property in the State of New York who are not related to the decedent pay a still higher tax. I do not know whether the Congress of the United States regards that as a proper classification, but through a long term of years in the State of New York we have made up our minds that that represents justice in the imposition of inheritance taxes. The further removed in kinship from the decedent, the more fortunate in proportion is the heir, and in one sense the luckier; his expectations up to the time of the death of the owner of the property presumably had not been as high, and he is indebted in a greater degree to the State for his protection in the transfer than the heir of closer kinship. So we ask him to pay more.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. We also have an inheritance tax in my own State, graduated not only as to the size of the estate but according to the degree of kinship. As the blood grows more remote the amount of the tax paid increases, which I consider a very fair way of raising revenue.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the State of Illinois, as the Senator says, has come to the same conclusion as has the State of New York. If I may repeat the expression again, it is one of the refinements which every legislative body should consider very carefully. In other words, we ought not to impose taxes with an axe; we ought to think of the various elements which exist among the people upon whom we are imposing the taxes.

Mr. President, on direct inheritances in the State of New York the State taxes every estate in excess of $5,000. Contrast that with the $50,000 exemption in this proposed law. The rate is 1 per cent on any amount up to and including the sum of $25,000, 2 per cent on the next $75,000, 3 per cent on the next $100,000, and 4 per cent on the amount representing the balance of each individual transfer. The Senators are already familiar with the rates of the Federal inheritance tax as set forth in this bill. But, Mr. President, I have gone to the trouble of getting up a little table showing what the estates of New York will pay under the combined State and Federal inheritance taxes.

The first table has to do only with direct inheritances in the State of New York. Let us take an estate of $100,000 left by a citizen of the State of New York to his son. The State of New York will collect from that estate $1,750; the Federal Government will collect $500, a total of $2,250, or, roughly speaking, 2¼ per cent upon the value of the estate. And there is this distinction to be borne in mind when we are comparing the State tax and the Federal tax, and once again it has to do with the refinements of taxation:

The State of New York does not place an inheritance tax upon those portions of an estate which are left to charitable institutions or to churches or to educational societies or organizations or schools or colleges or universities. The Federal tax is to be imposed without any distinction as between the money received by a son for his personal enjoyment and the money received by a great charitable institution which is to be devoted to the good of the community in alleviating distress.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we were bound to have an inheritance tax imposed by the Federal Government those who framed the bill might have taken that point into consideration and relieved the charitable institutions of the United States from this burden of taxation, for, Senators, this inheritance-tax provision as drafted and on our desks at present will discourage the giving of money by private individuals in their wills to charitable institutions, and any such result, I think, is very greatly to be regretted.

Take an estate of $200,000 in New York. The State will collect $4,750, the Federal Government $2,500, a total of $7,250, or 3⅝ per cent.

Take an estate of half a million dollars. The State of New York will collect $16,750, the Federal Government will collect $13,500, a total of $30,250 from a half-million-dollar estate. If an estate is invested in securities which bring in an average rate of income of 5 per cent, its total income will be in the neighborhood of $25,000 on a half-million-dollar estate. The combined taxes of the Federal Government and the State government in the State of New York will more than wipe out the entire first year's income of that estate.
